"'In expressing to Your Majesty my sincere thanks for this extreme kindness I am happy to take the opportunity to offer you the homage of sentiment, a very profound respect with which I have the honor to sign myself Your Majesty's very humble and devoted servant.

"'GASPARRI.'

TEXT OF POPE'S APPEAL.

"The appeal follows:

"'To the leaders of the belligerent peoples:

"'Since the beginning of our pontificate the horrors of a terrible war let loose on Europe, we have in view above everything three things to preserve: Perfect impartiality toward all belligerents, as is suitable for Him who is the Common Father and who loves all His children with equal affection. Continually to attempt to do all the good possible, and that without exception of person, without distinction of nationality or religion, as is dictated to us by the universal law of charity whicl. the supreme spiritual charge has confided to us with Christ.

"'Finally, as our pacific mission also requires to omit nothing as long as it was in our power which might contribute to hasten the end of this calamity by trying to lead people and their leaders to more moderate resolution to hasten a serene deliberation of a peace just and durable.

HAS URGED PEACE BEFORE.

"'Whoever has followed our work during those three painful years which has just passed has been able easily to recognize that if we had always remained faithful to our resolve of absolute impartiality and to our attitude of benevolence we have not ceased to exhort the peoples and the belligerent brothers again to become brethren, although publicity has not been given to all that we have done to attain this very noble aim.

"'Toward the end of the first year of the war we addressed to the nations in conflict most lovely exhortations, and more we indicated the part to be followed to arrive at a stable and honorable peace for all. Unfortunately our appeal was not heard and the war continued desperately for another two years with all its horrors.

"'It became even more cruel and extended over the earth, over the sea, and in the air, and one saw desolation and death descend upon the cities without defense, upon peaceful villages, and on their innocent population, and now no one can imagine how the sufferings of all would be increased and aggravated if other months or, worse still, other years are about to be added to this sanguinary triennium.

POPE'S INTERVENTION IMPLORED.

"'Is this civilized world to be nothing more than a field of death? And Europe so glorious and so flourishing, is it going as if stricken by a universal madness to run to the abyss and to lend its hand to its own suicide?

"'In such a terrible situation as in the presence of a menace so serious we who have no particular political aim, who do not listen to suggestions or to the interests of any of the belligerent parties, but are solely compelled by a sentiment of our supreme duty as the common father of the faithful, by the solicitation of our children who implore our intervention and our pacifying work.

"'Through the voice even of humanity and of reason we once more emit the cry of peace, and we renew a pressing appeal to those who hold in their hands the destinies of nations.

BASIS OF JUST PEACE.

"'But in order no longer to speak in general terms as the circumstances had counseled us in the past, we now wish to make a more concrete and practical proposal and to invite the governments of the belligerents to come to an agreement upon the following points which seem to be a basis of a just and durable peace, leaving to them the task of analyzing and completing them.

"'First of all, the fundamental points must be that the material force of arms be substituted by the moral force of right, from which shall arise a fair agreement by all for the simultaneous and reciprocal dimunition of armaments, according to the rules and guarantees to be established, in a measure necessary and sufficient for the maintenance of public order in each State.

"'Then in the substitution for armies the institution of arbitration with its high pacifying function, according to the rules to be laid down and the penalties to be imposed on a State which would refuse either to submit a national question to arbitration or to accept its decision.

"'Once the supremacy of right has thus been established all obstacles to the means of communication of the peoples would disappear by assuring, by rules to be fixed later, the true liberty and community of the seas which would contribute to the numerous causes of conflict and would also open to all new sources of prosperity and progress.

WOULD FORGIVE DAMAGES.

"'As to the damages to be repaired and as to the war expenses, we see no other means of solving the question than by submitting as a general principle the complete and reciprocal condonation, which would be justified, moreover, by the immense benefit to be derived from disarmament, so much so that no one will undertake the continuation of a similar carnage solely for reasons of an economic order.

"'If for certain cases there exist particular reasons, they should be deliberated upon with justice and equity, but these pacific agreements, with the immense advantages to be derived from them, are not possible without reciprocal restitution of the territory at present occupied.

"'Consequently, on the part of Germany, the complete evacuation of Belgium, with the guaranty of her full political, military, and economic independence toward it.

"'The evacuation of French territory. On the part of other belligerent parties similar restitution of the German colonies.

EQUITY FOR TERRITORIAL ISSUE.

"'As regards the territorial questions, as, for example, those which have arisen between Italy and Austria and between Germany and France, there is reason to hope that in consideration of the immense advantages of a durable peace with disarmament, the parties in conflict would wish to examine them with a conciliatory disposition, taking into consideration, as we have said formerly, the aspirations of the peoples and the special interests and of the general welfare of the great human society.

"'The same spirit of equity and justice ought to be followed in the examination of other territorial and political questions, notably those relative to Armenia and the Balkan States and territories making a part of the ancient kingdom of Poland, whose noble and historical traditions and sufferings which it has endured, especially during the present war, ought to conciliate the sympathies of nations.

"'Such are the principal bases whereupon we believe the future reorganization of the peoples ought to be built. They are of a nature to render impossible the return of similar conflicts and to prepare a solution of the economic question so important for the future and for the material well-being of all belligerent States.

"'Therefore in presenting to you, who directs at this hour the destinies of the belligerent nations, we are animated to see them accepted and to see thus the conclusion at an early date of the terrible struggle which more and more appears a useless massacre.

HONOR OF ALL SAFE.

"'The whole world recognizes that the honor of the armies of both sides is safe. Incline your ears, therefore, to our prayer. Accept the fraternal invitation which we send you in the name of the Divine Redeemer, the Prince of Peace. Reflect on your very grave responsibility before God and before man.

"'On your decision depends the repose and the joy of innumerable families, the life of thousands of young people; in a word, the happiness of a people for whom it is your absolute duty to obtain their welfare.

"'May the Lord inspire your decision in conformity to His very holy will. May God grant that while meriting the applause of your contemporaries you will also obtain in the future generations a splendid name of pacificators.

"'As for us, closely united in prayer and in penitence with all those faithful souls which sigh for peace, we implore for you the light and counsel of the Divine Spirit.

"'BENEDICT.

"MURDER IS NOW BLAMED FOR WAR—BAR ASSOCIATION DECIDES THAT ONE MURDER THAT WAS EASILY SUSCEPTIBLE OF ADJUDICATION HAS COST THE MURDER OF MILLIONS, AND THEY DECIDE TO SECURE INTERNATIONAL PEACE.

[By a staff correspondent of the Associated Press.]

"LONDON, August 15.

"Desire to assist in formulating 'a practicable plan in accordance with the principle of the league of nations to maintain international peace and justice after the war' was expressed in a resolution adopted by a conference of lawyers recently held here.

"Lord Parmoor, in his opening address, said he would like to see the question directly considered as to which of the nations at war are prepared to adopt some common international arrangement in order to prevent, as far as possible, any recurrence of such a war as the present one. This, he said, would be a fairly effective test of the real position.

"Baron Buckmaster, of Cheddington, formerly lord high chancellor, said it was exactly three years ago since Austria delivered the ultimatum to Serbia which had led to the conflagration in which the world was being fast consumed. It arose out of a murder which was easily susceptible of adjustment by a body of fair-minded men. Yet that one murder had cost the murder of millions, and millions more would yet be led to the sacrifice. Out of this welter of strife, in which no single point of agreement seemed capable of being reached, there was one point, he said, on which all were agreed, and that was when this war ended we must make conditions which would prevent it ever recurring. If any power imagined this security could be gained by crushing its adversaries, it was doomed to pitiable failure. The peoples, he said, would universally accept the idea of a league of nations.

"Lord Shaw expressed the opinion that armaments beyond those necessary for the maintenance of order within the State and for the national quota toward the international force should be an offense against the executive power of the league.

"Other speakers discussed the machinery of an international tribunal which should have authority to decide international questions and to enforce its decisions.

"Sir Walter Phillimore hoped there would be a Geneva convention or a Hague conference on a much larger and better scale, and that a league would be formed in which every nation that was a party to the treaty would at least have the opportunity of joining, and to which those few nations not necessarily parties to the treaty might accede."

"AMERICAN UNION AGAINST MILITARISM—WAR-TIME PROGRAM.

"With America's entry into the war we must redouble our efforts to maintain democratic liberties, to destroy militarism, and to build toward world federation. Therefore our immediate program is:

"1. To oppose all legislation tending to fasten upon the United States in war time any permanent military policy based on compulsory military training and service.

"2. To fight for the complete maintenance in war time of the constitutional rights of free speech, free press, peaceable assembly, and freedom from unlawful search and seizure. With this end in view the union has recently established a civil liberty bureau.

"3. To organize legal aid and advice for all men conscientiously opposed to participation in war.

"4. To demand publication by the Government of all agreements or understandings with other nations.

"5. To demand a clear and definite statement of the terms on which the United States will make peace.

"6. To develop the ideal of internationalism in the minds of the American people to the end that this Nation may stand firm for world federation at the end of the war.

"The American Union Against Militarism, impressed by the gross abuse of the undoubted rights of law-abiding citizens recently reported from all parts of the country, has established a civil liberties bureau for the maintenance in war time of the rights of free press, free speech, peaceable assembly, liberty of conscience, and freedom from unlawful search and seizure.

"It is the object of this bureau to act as a clearing house of free information, advice, and legal aid to citizens whose constitutional rights are assailed by reason of the war.

"In undertaking this responsibility we depend on the fullest cooperation of all citizens who care enough for their country to insist that, war or no war, civil liberty must be maintained in America.

"If you are one of these, send us your name and a contribution for the civil liberties defense fund.

"CIVIL LIBERTIES BUREAU,
"American Union Against Militarism,
"70 Fifth Avenue, New York."

"FROM ENGLAND NEWS HAS JUST COME OF THE TERMS OF A PEACE SETTLEMENT SUGGESTED BY THE UNION FOR DEMOCRATIC CONTROL. THIS CLEAR EXPRESSION OF THE VIEWS OF A LARGE AND INFLUENTIAL GROUP OF ENGLISH LIBERALS IS OF IMPORTANCE AND VALUE AT THIS TIME AS SHOWING THE TREND OF OPINION IN ENGLAND AND AS PROVIDING AN AUTHORITATIVE BASIS FOR DISCUSSION. THIS STATEMENT, WHICH IS HERE REPUBLISHED BY THE AMERICAN UNION AGAINST MILITARISM, WAS RECEIVED DIRECT FROM THE UNION FOR DEMOCRATIC CONTROL IN LONDON BY THE NEW YORK CALL AND WAS EXCLUSIVELY PUBLISHED IN THAT PAPER ON JULY 30.

"A stage in the war has been reached when the democracies of all the belligerent countries are beginning to work toward a peace based on the same general principles. The frankest statement of those ideas is contained in the declaration of the Russian democratic government in favor of:

"'Peace without annexations and without indemnities on the basis of the right of nations to decide their own destiny.'

"The Russian Government further declared:

"'The Government deems it to be its duty to declare now that free Russian does not aim at the domination of other nations, at depriving them of their national patrimony, or at occupying by force foreign territories, but that its object is to establish a durable peace on the basis of the rights of nations to decide their own destiny. The Russian nation does not lust after the strengthening of its power abroad at the expense of other nations.'

"On behalf of Great Britain, on May 23, Lord Robert Cecil, replying in the House of Commons, declared that:

"'Our aims and aspirations were dictated solely by our determination to secure a peace founded on national liberty and international amity, and that all imperialistic aims based on force and conquest were completely absent from our program.'

"President Wilson, in his recent message to Russia, declared:

"'No people must be forced under a sovereignty under which it does not wish to live. No territory must change hands except for the purpose of securing those who inhabit it a fair chance of life and liberty. No indemnities must be insisted on except those that constitute payment for manifest wrong done. No readjustments of power must be made except such as will tend to secure the future peace of the world and the future welfare and happiness of the peoples.'

"The German chancellor declared in the Reichstag on May 17:

"'We did not go to war and we are not fighting now against almost the whole world in order to make conquests, but only to secure our existence and firmly to establish the future of the nation.'

"We have here the common principles by which all the governments now profess to be guided.

"The frame of mind of the various nations is now such that no government can afford to lay itself open to the charge of prolonging the war for the purpose of annexing new territory, either in Europe or outside Europe.

"In consequence of this unanimity of profession the executive committee of the Union for Democratic Control has considered what these declarations mean in terms of practical politics and makes the following suggestions, which are not final nor incapable of modifications, but as a suitable basis for further examination and discussion.

"The settlement arrived at when the war concludes will necessarily be imperfect. The stability of peace will depend quite as much on the methods adopted for dealing with new international difficulties as they arise and the existence of international machinery for meeting racial, economic, and other rivalries in the future as upon the immediate wisdom of the settlement. Machinery for making international changes without war is one of the indispensable conditions of permanent peace.

"NO FORCIBLE ANNEXATIONS.

"As a preliminary to any rearrangement of territorial boundaries it ought to be made perfectly clear that all claims based on conquest, imperialistic ambition, or strategic considerations, such as a German demand for a revision of strategic frontiers in Belgium and elsewhere, an Italian demand for an Italian Dalmatia, or a Russian demand for Constantinople, are ruled out on principle. There must be a complete acceptance of a policy of 'no annexations.'

"Our suggestions are as follows:

"(a) Belgium:

"The complete reestablishment of the sovereign independence and integrity and the economic restoration of Belgium must be absolutely secured.

"(b) France:

"The invaded districts of France must be evacuated.

"(c) Serbia, Montenegro, and Roumania must be evacuated and their independence restored.

"(d) Alsace and Lorraine:

"The disposition of Alsace and Lorraine should be decided on the principles of the right of the population to control its own destiny. The decision would not necessarily imply the allocation of the whole of both Provinces to either France or Germany. Neither should the policy of autonomy be excluded.

"In this, as in other cases where the views of a population are subject to dispute, the question ought to be decided by a plebiscite or otherwise, under the supervision of an impartial international commission and free from the interference of occupying armies.

"(e) Trentino:

"The claims of Italy to Trentino or other 'unredeemed' districts ought to be decided by the same process.

"(f) Poland:

"Poland should be free and independent. The population of Austrian Poland and the Polish districts of Prussia should decide whether they wish to become part of Poland.

"(g) Austro-Hungarian Empire:

"An unfortunate impression was created by the allied note to President Wilson of January 10 that it is the fixed determination of the allies to break up the Austro-Hungarian Empire into independent States. This intention ought to be explicitly repudiated by all the allies, as it has been by the Russian democracy. But it must be made clear that freedom for the component population of that empire can be obtained by self-government within that empire, as it can be secured for the Finns in Russia and for the Irish within the British Empire.

"(h) Other problems:

"There are very complicated problems, such as Polish claims on Dantzig, Bulgaria's claim on Macedonia, Roumania's claim on Transylvania, and the future status of Persia, which obviously can not be settled by any military decision, but which ought to be referred to an international commission appointed with the cooperation and authority of the nations of Europe.

"(i) Turkey:

"Russian democracy has repudiated the imperialistic policy of the Czar to annex Constantinople. The way is therefore open for a proposal to neutralize or internationalize the city and the straits. It is against the interest of the world that the great trading waterways of the world should be in the hands of single powers.

"The policy of international control over the Ottoman Empire should be maintained and extended so as to provide full security for the Christian peoples and freedom of development for other races under the suzerainty of the sultan.

But no immediate settlement of the Turkish Empire can be regarded as final. The arrangements would necessarily have to be revised from time to time by the league of nations. The maximum of freedom for the various nationalities and freedom of trade between all the parts and equality of economic opportunity for the nationals of all European powers should be the policy followed.

"(k) German colonies:

"Great Britain should repudiate definitely any claim to annex German colonies by right of conquest.

"As recently as 1885, by the general act of the conference of Berlin, an assignment of sovereign rights in Africa was made by the great powers. A shifting of the political frontiers in existence before the war has become inevitable. It may be that such territorial readjustments will involve political changes under which some part of the African territory hitherto administered by Germany may be transferred.

"The principle of no annexations, however, requires a frank recognition that in the interests of a lasting peace Germany is not less entitled than other great powers to organize and develop oversea dependencies.

"The great zone of tropical Africa should be neutralized under an international guarantee and absolute freedom of enterprise established there.

"A less exclusive trade policy enforced throughout Africa by international arrangement would greatly facilitate the adjustment of national territorial claims.

"Under a general rearrangement of territories the Pacific islands might be dealt with as well as Africa.

"NO PUNITIVE PENALTIES.

"Belgium is entitled to special relief from Germany owing to the circumstances under which she was forced into war.

"No indemnities should be demanded in the sense of payments to recover the expenses of the war, but there should be a common fund provided by all the belligerent nations to assist the recovery of the parts of the world most seriously devastated by the war. An international commission should decide the allocation of the common funds.

"GUARANTIES OF PERMANENT PEACE.

"The foundation of all future hopes of permanent peace lies in the establishment of a league of nations. That will become a reality only in so far as all the peoples are led to see that such a league offers better hope of national security than the old system of competitive armament. We can not hope to destroy militarism so long as there is a chance of governments being able to persuade their people that the only means of national security lies in preponderant military power. Our first task is to convince the masses of every country that in a league of nations they may find a means of defense which renders their old militarism unnecessary.

"Such a league of nations, with a common undertaking to submit disputes to arbitration and to form an international council or parliament for dealing with international problems as they become critical has been proposed by President Wilson on behalf of the United States and accepted in principle by the British, French, Russian, Austro-Hungarian, and German Governments.

"The second condition indispensable to permanent peace is to persuade the German and Austrian populations that their right to equal opportunity for economic expansion and for access to raw materials will be secure without their being obliged to fight for them. To secure this, the nations should agree to reciprocal equality of commercial opportunity in all their dependencies. Upon the breaking down of commercial exclusiveness depends the good will of the future. The policy of economic warfare laid down by the Paris conference should be repudiated as being opposed to international peace.

"The disappearance of secret diplomacy is essential to permanent peace. Secret treaties should be prohibited by international agreement and should be regarded as void. All treaties should be sanctioned by the national parliaments and subject to periodical revision.

"The largest measure of agreement for the reduction of armaments on land and sea should be obtained at the settlement.

"We suggest that while the removal of the motive for arming among nations will prove to be the only real guaranty for an effective reduction, a method might be adopted by means of international inspection of armament establishments for controlling the execution of any agreement for immediate reduction which may be reached by the settlement.

"Nations should agree to abolish private enterprise in the production of armaments.

"This question should be surveyed in the light of the infraction of the rights of neutrals in time of war and of the security of economic opportunity for all nations in time of peace.

"The Russian Government on May 19, 1917, issued the following proclamation:

"'The Provisional Government, reorganized and reenforced by representatives of the revolutionary democracy, declares that it will energetically carry into effect the ideas of liberty, equality, and fraternality, beneath the standards of which the great Russian Revolution came to birth. The Provisional Government is united as to the fundamental lines of its future action, as follows:

"'First. In foreign policy the Provisional Government rejecting, in concert with the entire people, all thought of a separate peace, adopts openly as its aim the reestablishment of a general peace which shall not tend toward dominion over other nations, the seizure of their national possessions, or violent usurpation of their territories—a peace without [forcible] annexation or [punitive] indemnities and based on the right of nations to decide their own affairs.'"

"The United States Congress on July 30, 1917, was asked by the American Union Against Militarism to act on the following resolution:

"'Whereas the democratic government of Russia has declared in favor of an early general peace on a basis of no forcible annexations and no punitive indemnities; and

"'Whereas the German Reichstag on July 19, by a vote of 214 to 116 declared in favor of a peace without forced acquisitions of territory and without political, economic, and financial violations; and

"'Whereas the Congress of the United States has made no declaration of the terms on which this country would be willing to enter into peace negotiations: Therefore be it

"'Resolved, That the Congress of the United States hereby declares its sympathy with democratic Russia's attitude toward the war and its willingness to enter into peace negotiations with the Russian formula as a basis, recognizing, however, that independent Belgium will be entitled to special restitution from Germany owing to the circumstances under which she was forced into the war, and recommending that the disposition of certain much-disputed borderlands should be determined by plebiscite under the supervision of an impartial international commission on the principle of the right of the population to control its own destiny.

"'That the Congress of the United States welcomes the German Reichstag peace resolution as an attempt on the part of the German people to express their desire for a peace of reconciliation without annexation and without indemnity.

"'That the Congress of the United States calls upon the Parliaments of England, France, Italy, and our other allies which, since the entrance into the war of the two great Republics, Russia and America, have given no indication of the terms on which they would make peace, to adopt resolutions expressing their willingness to enter into peace negotiations with the Russian formula as a basis.'"

"AUTHORITY OF PRESIDENT TO SEND MILITIA INTO A FOREIGN COUNTRY.

"The Constitution, which enumerates the exclusive purposes for which the militia may be called into the service of the United States, affords no warrant for the use of the militia by the General Government, except to suppress insurrection, repel invasions, or to execute the laws of the Union, and hence the President has no authority to call forth the Organized Militia of the States and send it into a foreign country with the Regular Army as a part of an army of occupation.

"DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
"February 17, 1912.

"SIR: I have the honor to respond to your note of the 8th instant, in which you ask my opinion upon the following question:

"'Whether or not, under existing laws, the President has authority to call forth the Organized Militia of the States and send it into a foreign country with the Regular Army as a part of an army of occupation, especially should the United States intervene in the affairs of such country under conditions short of actual warfare?'

"From very early times, in both England and this country, the militia has always been considered and treated as a military body quite distinct and different from the Regular or Standing Army, governed by different laws and rules, and equally different as to the time, place, or occasion of its service. One of the most notable points of difference is this: While the latter was in the continued service of the Government and might be called into active service at all times and in all places where armed force is required for any purpose, the militia could be called into the actual service of the Government only in the few special cases provided for by law. Their service has always been considered as of a rather domestic character, for the protection and defense of their own country and the enforcement of its laws.

"This has always been the English doctrine, and in some instances acts of Parliament have expressly forbidden the use of the militia outside of the Kingdom.

"Our ancestors, who framed and adopted our Constitution and early laws, got their ideas of a militia, its nature, and purposes from this, and must be taken to have intended substantially the same military body, with the same limitations of the occasion and nature of their service. If they had intended to enlarge this they would have said so, just as they have when they intended to further limit or restrict the occasion or nature of their service.

"When the Constitution gives to Congress the power 'to raise and support armies,' and to provide 'for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions,' and makes the President 'the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States,' it is speaking of two different bodies—the one the Regular Army, in the continuous service of the Government, and liable to be called into active service at any time, or in any place where armed force is required; and the other a body for domestic service, and liable to be called into the service of the Government only upon the particular occasions named in the Constitution. And acts of Congress relating to the Army and the militia must have the same construction.

"It is certain that it is only upon one or more of these three occasions—when it is necessary to suppress insurrections, repel invasion, or to execute the laws of the United States—that even Congress can call this militia into the service of the United States, or authorize it to be done.

"As 'insurrection' is necessarily internal and domestic, within the territorial limits of the Nation, this portion of the sentence can afford no warrant for sending the militia to suppress it elsewhere. And even if an insurrection of our own citizens were set on foot and threateningly maintained in a foreign jurisdiction and upon our border, to send an armed force there to suppress it would be an act of war which the President can not rightfully do.

"The term 'to repel invasion' may be, in some respects, more elastic in its meaning. Thus, if the militia were called into the service of the General Government to repel an invasion, it would not be necessary to discontinue their use at the boundary line, but they might (within certain limits, at least) pursue and capture the invading force, even beyond that line, and just as the Regular Army might be used for that purpose. This may well be held to be within the meaning of the term 'to repel invasion.'

"Then, too, if an armed force were assembled upon our border, so near and under circumstances which plainly indicated hostility and an intended invasion, this Government might attack and capture or defeat such forces, using either the Regular Army or the militia for that purpose. This, also, would be but one of the ways of repelling an invasion.

"But this is quite different from and affords no warrant for sending the militia into a foreign country in time of peace and when no invasion is made or threatened.

"The only remaining occasion for calling out the militia is 'to execute the laws of the Union.' But this certainly means to execute such laws where, and only where, they are in force and can be executed or enforced. The Constitution or laws of the United States have no extra territorial force and can not be compulsorily executed beyond or outside of the territorial limits of the United States.

"It is true that treaties made in pursuance of the Constitution are, equally with acts of Congress, the supreme law of the land; but their observance, outside of our own jurisdiction, can not be enforced in the same way. The observance and performance, outside of our own jurisdiction, of treaty stipulations and obligations are left much to the honor, good faith, and comity of the other contracting party, reenforced at times by a regard for the consequences of a breach. We can not send either the Regular Army or the Militia into a foreign country to execute such treaties or our laws. Such an invasion of a foreign country would be an act of war.

"Outside of our own limits 'the laws of the Union' are not executed by armed force, either regular or militia.

"The Constitution had already given to Congress the unlimited power to declare war at any time and for whatever cause it chose. It did not, in this provision, attempt the useless thing of giving to Congress an additional power to declare war or to afford an additional ground for doing so.

"What is certainly meant by this provision is that Congress shall have power to call out the militia in aid of the civil power for the peaceful execution of the laws of the Union wherever such laws are in force and may be compulsorily executed, much as if a sheriff may call upon the posse comitatus to peacefully disperse a riot or execute the laws.

"Under our Constitution, as it has been uniformly construed from the first, the military is subordinate and subservient to the civil power, and it can be called upon to execute the laws of the Union only in aid of the civil power and where the civil power has jurisdiction of such enforcement. Even the Regular Army can be thus called upon only on such occasions; and, certainly, the militia can not be thus called upon at any other.

"Then, as the civil power is without force in a foreign country, and as even the Regular Army can not be sent into another country to there execute the laws of the Union, it follows that the Constitution confers no power to send the militia into a foreign country for the purpose stated in the question here considered. On the contrary, by its specific enumeration of the only occasions for calling out the militia, it clearly forbids this.

"In all this I am not unmindful that nations sometimes do make hostile demonstrations and use armed force to compel the observance by another nation of its treaty obligations, and sometimes send armed forces into another country to protect the lives and rights of its own citizens there.

"I shall briefly notice these in their application to our own country, its Constitution and laws. It will be observed, and as controlling and conclusive of the present question, that in case of a hostile demonstration against or a forcible attack upon another nation to enforce its treaty obligations, or to punish their infraction, there is no question involved of executing the laws of the invading nation, for such laws have no force or existence there. While the Constitution makes itself and the laws and treaties, in pursuance thereof, the supreme law of the land, it is only in our own land where such laws are supreme or of any force. As to the other contracting party, a treaty is a mere compact, depending for its observance upon the good faith, comity, or other moral considerations. The Constitution can not make itself or the treaties or laws made under it the supreme law of any other nation or give to either any force or existence beyond our own borders. So that when an armed force is used to compel the observance of treaty obligations or to punish or obtain compensation for their violation, there is no question of executing any law of the Union, for there is no such law there. It is but the forcible compelling of the observance of an agreement or compensation for its breach. The provision referred to does not warrant the use of the militia for this purpose.

"Just so it is when in troublous times an army of occupation, large or small, is sent into a foreign country to protect the lives and the rights of our own citizens. Here, too, no law of the Union is being executed by such invasion, for no law of the Union exists or can be enforced there.

"While it is the duty of every nation to afford proper protection to foreigners who are lawfully within its borders, yet this is not because of any law of the nation of which such foreigners are subjects, for no such laws exist or have any force there. No one can say, in such a case, that we are executing or enforcing any law of the Union. We are but aiding or compelling the foreign government to execute its own laws and to perform its own duty. As no law of the Union is being executed by such invasion, the militia can not be called out under this provision to take part in it. As no law of the Union can exist or be in force in any foreign country, the militia can not be called out to enforce any such law there.

"The plain and certain meaning and effect of this constitutional provision is to confer upon Congress the power to call out the militia 'to execute the laws of the Union' within our own borders where, and where only, they exist, have any force, or can be executed by anyone. This confers no power to send the militia into a foreign country to execute our laws which have no existence or force there and can not be there executed.

"If authority is needed for the conclusion here reached, the following may suffice:

"In Ordronaux, Constitutional Legislation, page 501, it is said:

"'The Constitution distinctly enumerates the three exclusive purposes for which the militia may be called into the service of the United States. These purposes are: First, to execute the laws of the Union; second, to suppress insurrection; and third, to repel invasions.

"'These three occasions representing necessities of a strictly domestic character, plainly indicate that the services required of the militia can be rendered only upon the soil of the United States or of its Territories. * * * In the history of this provision of the Constitution, there is nothing indicating that it was even contemplated that such troops should be employed for purposes of offensive warfare outside the limits of the United States. And it is but just to infer that the enumeration of the specific occasions on which alone the militia can be called into the service of the General Government was intended as a distinct limitation upon their employment.

"'Being the ministers of the law to enforce its commands, they can only be summoned by the law-making power to act within the extent of its jurisdiction and in the manner prescribed by the Constitution. They can not, consequently, be used to invade the territory of a neighboring country or to enforce any public rights abroad. * * *

"'The militia of the States, restricted to domestic purposes alone, are to be distinguished therefore from the Army proper of the United States, which, whether in the form of regular troops or volunteers, may be used to invade a foreign country as well as to repel the attack of foreign enemies.'

"And in Von Holtz, Constitutional Law, page 170, it is said, 'the militia can not be taken out of the country.'

"In Kneedler v. Lane (45 Pa. St., 238, 276) Judge Strong, speaking for the court, said:

"'Apart from the obligations assumed by treaty, it was well known that there are many cases where the rights of a nation and of its citizens can not be protected or vindicated within its own boundaries. But the power conferred upon Congress over the militia is insufficient to enable the fulfillment of the demands of such treaties or to protect the rights of the Government or its citizens in those cases in which protection must be sought beyond the territorial limits of the country.'

"And see Houston v. Moore (5 Wheat., 1) and Martin v. Mott (12 Wheat., 19, 27).

"It is true that the act of January 21, 1903, as amended by the act of March 27, 1908 (35 Stat., 400) provides:

"'That whenever the President calls forth the Organized Militia of any State, Territory, or of the District of Columbia to be employed in the service of the United States he may specify in his call the period for which such service is required, and the militia so called shall continue to serve during the term so specified either within or without the territory of the United States, unless sooner relieved by order of the President.'

"But this must be read in view of the constitutional power of Congress to call forth the militia only to suppress insurrection, repel invasions, or to execute the laws of the Union. Congress can not, by its own enactment, enlarge the power conferred upon it by the Constitution; and if this provision were construed to authorize Congress to use the Organized Militia for any other than the three purposes specified it would be unconstitutional. This provision applies only to cases where, under the Constitution, said militia may be used outside of our own borders, and was doubtless inserted as a matter of precaution and to prevent the possible recurrence of what took place in our last war with Great Britain, when portions of the militia refused to obey orders to cross the Canadian frontier.

"I think that the constitutional provision here considered not only affords no warrant for the use of the militia by the General Government, except to suppress insurrection, repel invasions, or to execute the laws of the Union, but, by its careful enumeration of the three occasions or purposes for which the militia may be used, it forbids such use for any other purpose; and your question is answered in the negative.

"Respectfully,

"GEORGE W. WICKERSHAM."

EXCLUSION OF SECOND-CLASS MAIL MATTER.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a communication from the Postmaster General relative to the exclusison of certain publications from the mails.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., August 21, 1917.

Hon. JOHN H. BANKHEAD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: On August 17, 1917, Senator HARDWICK introduced Senate resolution 119, which appears on page 6109 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and is as follows:

"Resolved, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, requested and directed, if not incompatible with the public interest, to furnish to the Senate the following information:

"First. Whether or not, since the passage of the so-called espionage law, any newspapers, magazines, or other publications have been excluded from the mails or denied second-class mail-matter privileges under the provisions of said act, or otherwise.

"Second. If so, the names and post offices of entry of such publications.

"Third. The particular provisions of the law which the department claims to have been violated by such publications.

"Fourth. In what matter, specifically and particularly, the department claims such law has been violated by such publications, and by each of them."

I inclose for your consideration in connection with this resolution a copy of the adverse report of the House Committee on the Post Office and Post-Roads, under date of July 23, 1917, House resolution 115, introduced by Mr. LONDON. The London resolution is essentially the same as the Hardwick resolution, and is as follows:

"Resolved, That the Postmaster General furnish the House with the following information:

"Has any print, newspaper, circular, periodical, or other publication been denied the privileges of the mails in the enforcement of the espionage law (Public act No. 24, Sixty-fifth Congress, 'An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes')?

"If any print, circular, book, publication, periodical, or newspaper has been or have been so denied the privileges of the mails, the name or names of such print, circular, book, publication, periodical, or newspaper, and the date or dates when the privileges of the mail were denied to such publications.

"Has any reason been assigned to the publisher or publishers, writer or writers of any of the said publications at the time the privileges of the mails were denied, and if any such reason has been assigned, information as to the reason or reasons so assigned?

"Has any instruction or have any instructions been issued by the Postmaster General or the Post Office Department to local postmasters relative to the enforcement of the espionage law? What are these instructions, if any such have been issued?

("The correspondence between the Post Office Department and other departments of the Government relative to the enforcement of the espionage law, the disclosure of which correspondence is not incompatible with the public interest.")

Attached to the committee report on the London resolution will be found my letter to the chairman of the committee with reference thereto, as follows:

"Referring to House resolution No. 115, introduced by Mr. LONDON on the 10th instant and now before your committee and with regard to which you ask my views, I have to advise you that I feel this resolution should be reported adversely to the House.

"The act approved June 15, 1917 (espionage law), made certain matter nonmailable. The Post Office Department is proceeding to enforce this law. Certain newspapers and periodicals as well as circular matter have been declared by this department to be nonmailable under this act, and the department is considering various other similar matter upon which action is being taken.

"It appears that the second paragraph of the resolution, calling for a list of publications and other matter which have up to this time been declared nonmailable, must be read and considered in connection with the third paragraph, which reads as follows:

"'Has any reason been assigned to the publisher or publishers, writer or writers, of any of the said publications at the time the privileges of the mails were denied, and if any such reason has been assigned information as to the reason or reasons so assigned?'

"With respect to the third paragraph, I have to advise you that the postmasters at the places of publication of newspapers and periodicals, and the postmasters who submit other nonmailable matter, are advised (where the matter is found to come within the prohibited classes under the law) that it is nonmailable under the act of June 15, 1917 (espionage law). Postmasters are being instructed to notify each publisher promptly when his publication is held at the post office pending a ruling from the department as to its mailability. These cases were disposed of as quickly as possible here. Postmasters submitting such publications are advised by telegraph of the action of the department and the publishers promptly notified by them of the result.

"In view of certain information in the possession of the Government and investigations now being conducted with respect to some publications which have been declared nonmailable, as well as others now under consideration, I deem it incompatible with the public interest to disclose any further matter called for in the second and third paragraphs of the resolution.

"I also deem it incompatible with the public interest to disclose at this time the instructions issued by this department to or any correspondence with local postmasters with respect to matters growing out of the enforcement of this law or the correspondence between the Post Office Department and other departments of the Government relative to the matter, as called for in the fourth and fifth paragraphs of the resolution.

"I will state generally with respect to the action of the department that no newspaper or periodical has been denied the privilege of the mails as such. Particular issues of certain publications have been found to contain matter which would interfere with the operation or success of the military or naval forces of the United States or to promote the success of its enemies, or cause insubordination, disloyalty, mutiny, or refusal of duty in the military or naval forces of the United States, or obstruct the recruiting or enlistment service of the United States, or matter advocating or urging treason, insurrection, or forcible resistance to some law of the United States, and therefore nonmailable under the act in question. Publishers have been so advised whenever they have asked the department for the reasons for declaring their publications nonmailable.

"In the administration of this law nothing has been done by this department to suppress free criticism, right or wrong, of the Government, nor has the department attempted in any way to interfere with the legitimate expression of views which do not coincide with those of the Government in the matter of the war with Germany or any other matter.

"Any publisher who may question the validity of the rulings of the Post Office Department has the courts open to him for a review of any action which may have been taken under the law. A publication called The Masses has already filed a bill in the Federal court for the southern district of New York asking an injunction to restrain the execution of an order of the department to the postmaster at New York City to treat its August issue as nonmailable.

"Attached will be found a copy of the very recent remarks of Judge Rose in the Federal court at Baltimore, which will doubtless be of interest to your committee, although made in a criminal case where the matter in question did not pass through the mails."

With regard to the exclusion from the mails of the particular publication mentioned by Senator HARDWICK in his remarks at the time the Senate resolution was introduced by him, I beg to state that this matter is now pending in the courts of the United States, and there is inclosed for your information a copy of the opinion of Judge Hough, of the circuit court of appeals, rendered in passing upon a motion to stay the execution of the order of Judge Hand, referred to by Senator HARDWICK in the case of The Masses Publishing Co. Your attention is also requested to the charge to the jury by Judge Rose, which is attached to the committee report upon the London resolution.

My letter to Hon. JOHN A. MOON, chairman of the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, with respect to House resolution 115, above quoted, is applicable in its entirety to Senate resolution 119, and I wish to reiterate what is there said with reference to the advisability of making these matters public at this time in view of existing conditions throughout the country, which are now worse than they were at the time that letter was written.

Referring specifically to the statements of Senator HARDWICK, at pages 6109 and 6110 of the RECORD for August 17, I wish to state that the article in The Masses assailing the President was not the basis for declaring the August issue of that publication nonmailable or the subsequent revocation of the second-class mail privilege of The Masses. The Senator has evidently accepted as true one of the false and misleading statements published for the purpose of creating a sentiment against the execution of this law.

Senator HARDWICK is equally in error, into which he has permitted himself to be led in the same way, when he says that the Post Office Department, after excluding an issue of this publication as nonmailable—

"* * * Turned to another provision of the law and said to the publisher, 'Well, you can not continue to use the mails because you have not been going regularly through the mails at the time you were prevented from doing so by our order.'"

In order for any publication to have the second-class privilege it must, among other things, be issued regularly at stated intervals, and in order to be permitted to the mails under any classification it must be mailable under the law.

All of the publications, including The Masses, which have had the second-class privilege withdrawn on account of violations of the espionage act, have lost that classification primarily for the reason that they were publishing matter which made their issues nonmailable under any classification, and hence are not newspapers or other periodical publications within the meaning of the law governing second-class mail matter.

For many years this department has held publications not to be "regularly issued" in contemplation of law when any issue has contained nonmailable matter; and when the second-class privilege has been withdrawn under such circumstances the formal notice of withdrawal has contained the statement that the second-class privilege had been revoked on both of the grounds stated.

As a matter of fact, in the case of The Masses and other publications covered by the Hardwick resolution, following the usual practice of the department, not only have the particular issues which have been declared to be nonmailable, but various other issues of the publications have been taken into consideration in determining their right to the second-class privilege, so that the final action was necessarily based principally on other and very much broader grounds than a break in the continuity of the publication.

On the 15th instant there was filed in the Federal court for the southern district of Georgia a suit similar to that of The Masses Publishing Co. against the postmaster at Thomson, Ga., by Thomas E. Watson, publisher of the Jeffersonian, of that place. Several issues of that publication had been declared nonmailable in June and July last, and after notice and due hearing by this department this publisher was notified on the 11th instant that the second-class mail privilege had been withdrawn by me. The hearing before the Federal court in this case will be concluded next Saturday, August 24.

The final decisions of the courts in these cases and others likely to follow at an early date, as well as decisions in certain criminal cases, will in a short time clearly define the legal situation.

From matter received at this department from various sections of the country, I find that there is an organized propaganda to discredit and handicap in every way the Government in the prosecution of this war, with the clear and unmistakable purpose of defeating the objects for which the Government is spending billions of dollars and will probably be called upon to sacrifice thousands of lives. The publications forming a part of this propaganda in many cases so guard their utterances as the editors think will keep them out of prison. They are nevertheless united in publishing the same class of matter, whether it be true or half true or wholly false, and are daily accomplishing results clearly in violation of the act of June 15, 1917 (espionage law). Prominent among these publications stand The Masses and the Jeffersonian. Their respective editors are leaders in the movement. Their writings and speeches are quoted with approval by the press of this character throughout the country, as well as in circular matter emanating from the same sources.

In my opinion, any such course as that contemplated by the Hardwick resolution is much against the public interest and public welfare at this time. I deem it incompatible with the public interest to disclose the information called for by the resolution and trust that it will be reported adversely by the committee, as was done with a similar resolution introduced by Mr. LONDON in the House.

Publications of this class have from week to week contended that the so-called draft act recently passed by Congress is unconstitutional, and under the pretense of legitimate argument have actually discouraged enlistments, obstructed the execution of the draft act, and prevented subscriptions to the bonds issued to raise money to carry on the war.

In this connection I inclose for your information a copy of the opinion rendered by Judge Spear, of the Federal court for the southern district of Georgia, in the cases of Albert Jones and John Storey, in which the constitutionality of the draft act is sustained. I also inclose a copy of the order revoking the second-class mail privilege of The Masses, which gives the reason for the action taken by the department in that case.

Very truly, yours,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

(Inclosure.)

[House Report No. 109, 65th Cong., 1st sess.]

MATTER ALLEGED TO BE UNMAILABLE UNDER THE ESPIONAGE LAW.

Mr. MOON, of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which committee resolution No. 115 was referred, reports the resolution by order of the committee back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be not agreed to and that the same lie on the table, together with the letter of the Postmaster General attached as an exhibit thereto and made a part of this report.

The Postmaster General, in reply to the request for information on the resolution, has given all of the information which he deems compatible with the public interest. Congress has no right to exact more from another coordinate branch of the Government.

In view of the treasonable utterances of many newspapers and others seeking to embarrass the Government in the enforcement of the war measures, it can be readily seen that it would be unwise for the department to enter into a full discussion of all of its plans and conduct to suppress opposition to the enforcement of law. Since the courts of the country are open to the speedy redress of any injustice that may possibly occur by action on the part of the postal authorities, it is clear that all persons who are aggrieved should be remitted to their remedy in the courts.

EXHIBIT A.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., July 21, 1917.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON,
Chairman of Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. MOON: Referring to House resolution No. 115, introduced by Mr. LONDON on the 10th instant and now before your committee, and with regard to which you ask my views, I have to advise you that I feel this resolution should be reported adversely to the House.

The act approved June 15, 1917 (espionage law), made certain matter nonmailable. The Post Office Department is proceeding to enforce this law. Certain newspapers and periodicals as well as circular matter have been declared by this department to be nonmailable under this act, and the department is considering various other similar matter upon which action is being taken.

It appears that the second paragraph of the resolution, calling for a list of publications and other matter which have up to this time been declared nonmailable, must be read and considered in connection with the third paragraph, which reads as follows:

"Has any reason been assigned to the publisher or publishers, writer or writers, of any of the said publications at the time the privileges of mails were denied, and if any such reason has been assigned information as to the reason or reasons so assigned"?

With respect to the third paragraph, I have to advise you that the postmasters at the places of publication of newspapers and periodicals, and the postmasters who submit other nonmailable matter, are advised (where the matter is found to come within the prohibited classes under the law) that it is nonmailable under the act of June 15, 1917 (espionage law). Postmasters are being instructed to notify each publisher promptly when his publication is held at the post office pending a ruling from the department as to its mailability. These cases were disposed of as quickly as possible here. Postmasters submitting such publications are advised by telegraph of the action of the department and the publishers promptly notified by them of the result.

In view of certain information in the possession of the Government and investigations now being conducted with respect to some publications which have been declared nonmailable, as well as others now under consideration, I deem it incompatible with the public interest to disclose any further matter called for in the second and third paragraphs of the resolution.

I also deem it incompatible with the public interest to disclose at this time the instructions issued by this department to or any correspondence with local postmasters with respect to matters growing out of the enforcement of this law or the correspondence between the Post Office Department and other departments of the Government relative to the matter, as called for in the fourth and fifth paragraphs of the resolution.

I will state generally with respect to the action of the department that no newspaper or periodical has been denied the privilege of the mails as such. Particular issues of certain publications have been found to contain matter which would interfere with the operation or success of the military or naval forces of the United States or to promote the success of its enemies, or cause insubordination, disloyalty, mutiny, or refusal of duty in the military or naval forces of the United States, or obstruct the recruiting or enlistment service of the United States, or matter advocating or urging treason, insurrection, or forcible resistance to some law of the United States, and therefore nonmailable under the act in question. Publishers have been so advised whenever they have asked the department for the reasons for declaring their publications nonmailable.

In the administration of this law nothing has been done by this department to suppress free criticism, right or wrong, of the Government, nor has the department attempted in any way to interfere with the legitimate expression of views which do not coincide with those of the Government in the matter of the war with Germany or any other matter.

Any publisher who may question the validity of the rulings of the Post Office Department has the courts open to him for a review of any action which may have been taken under the law. A publication called The Masses has already filed a bill in the Federal court for the southern district of New York, asking an injunction to restrain the execution of an order of the department to the postmaster at New York City to treat its August issue as nonmailable.

Attached will be found a copy of the very recent remarks of Judge Rose, in the Federal court at Baltimore, which will doubtless be of interest to your committee, although made in a criminal case where the matter in question did not pass through the mails.

Very truly, yours,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

EXHIBIT B.

[By Judge Rose.]

[In the United States District Court for the District of Maryland. July 11, 1917. The United States of America v. Romanus E. Baker and Jacob M. Wilhide.]

REMARKS OF THE COURT IN RULING UPON ADMISSIBILITY OF TESTIMONY.

The COURT. I might as well make perfectly clear what I understand to be the issue in the case.

Every man has a perfect right to any opinion he may see fit to form about any proposed law or about any law that is on the statute books. Any man may do anything, in itself legal, to secure the repeal of any law in force. To that end he may make any argument that commends itself to his reason and judgment against the policy of any particular law, whether it be the law for a selective draft or any other. And he is not answerable for the wisdom of his arguments. He could not very well be put on trial even for the good faith of some of them. I am afraid, if he could be, most of the political orators in every campaign would be liable for much they say about the other party. We all of us say more against our political opponents than we really believe. But there is one limit: As long as the law is the law, it is the duty of every man to obey it, and he may not, under color or pretense of arguing against the wisdom of the law, or of advocating its repeal, do anything with intent to procure its violation. Now, I have not seen these circulars that were distributed by the defendants; they may be wise or unwise, temperate or intemperate. I do not know a thing about them.

But the one thing the jury is to inquire into is not as to the wisdom or the lack of wisdom of any statements in those circulars, or their truthfulness or their fairness. That is not the question. The one sole question in the case is whether these men, in anything they did, intended to persuade men not to register under the draft, or, after they were registered, to persuade them not to obey the order to come to the colors. That is the one question. So the real inquiry here is, Can the Government show, always beyond a reasonable doubt, that these men were trying to persuade people to disobey the law? Whether they approached candidates for enlistment or persons within the age for enlistment and made any statements to such persons which might naturally make such persons reluctant to obey the law, is one of the facts to be taken into consideration by the jury; but the jury can not convict unless they are satisfied, of course, beyond a reasonable doubt, that these men were then engaged in doing something which they purposed and intended should prevent men within the military age from obeying the law. If the jury is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, then the case is made out. If they have any doubt about the purpose of these men, they must acquit them, however mistaken the jury may happen to think they were about the policy of the law, however unfair or extravagant the jury may think their arguments against it were.

The COURT. I do not think there is anything to go to the jury in this case.

You may have your own opinions about that circular; I have very strong individual opinions about it, and as to the wisdom and fairness of what is said there; but so far as I can see, it is principally a circular intended to induce people to subscribe to Socialist newspapers and to get recruits for the Socialist Party. I do not think that we ought to attempt to prosecute people for that kind of thing. It may be very unwise in its effect, and it may be unpatriotic at that particular time and place, but it would be going very far indeed, further, I think, than any law that I know of would justify, to hold that there has been made out any case here even tending to show that there was an attempt to persuade men not to obey the law.

There is a very lurid description of the horrors of war in that circular, some of it well written, some of it not so well written. But, after all, there is no difference of opinion that war is a terrible catastrophe and involves many terrible things. The circular develops some sort of a theory, not very clearly argued out, that if everybody had voted the Socialist ticket there would have been no war. The circular ends up with an appeal to subscribe to the Socialist paper for 50 cents a year, or 25 cents for every six months.

Mr. LATANE. The side of it that appealed to the Government was this, your honor: Of course, we are perfectly satisfied with your honor's determination of the matter, but just in explanation, it starts out with the words "Conscription is upon us, and the draft law is a fact."

The COURT. That I understand to be a fair and reasonable deduction that from their point of view it all could be avoided if the people earlier had taken this Socialist paper and had voted the Socialist ticket.

Mr. LATANE. The point that occurred to the Government is this: These people are too clever to directly, in print, attack the draft law, so under guise of advocating the principles of the Socialist Party, they give the whole draft proposition a very raw deal.

The COURT. That is possible, but you must prove the intent beyond the possibility of a reasonable doubt.

Mr. LATANE. All we want is to get some judicial determination of the matter.

The COURT. The judicial determination of the matter is that in whatever form they put what they say or do, whether that of advocating the principles of any political party—Republican, Democratic, Prohibitionist, Socialist—or under any other guise whatsoever, it is an offense to do anything with the intent of bringing about a violation of the law, but the commission of that offense must be proved, the intent must be established by evidence which will justify a jury in holding that it was made out beyond a reasonable doubt, and in this case there is no such evidence.

Gentlemen of the jury, you have the instructions of the court to return a verdict of not guilty.

True copy.

Test.

[SEAL.] ARTHUR L. SPAMER, Clerk.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., August 15, 1917.

POSTMASTER,
New York, N. Y.:

Upon the issuance of a citation to the publisher of The Masses to show cause why the authorization of admission of that publication to the second class of mail matter should not be revoked, and upon receipt and consideration of the written response thereto, and after a hearing accorded the publisher's attorney on August 14, 1917, the department, upon consideration of all the facts before it, hereby determines, and you will so inform the publisher, that The Masses is not entitled to transmission in the mails at the second-class rates of postage, because it appears from the evidence in possession of the department that the publication is not a "newspaper or other periodical publication" within the meaning of the law governing mail-abel matter of the second class, and, furthermore, is not regularly issued at stated intervals as a newspaper or other periodical publication within the meaning of the law, it being in conflict with the provisions of the law embodied in section 481½, Postal Laws and Regulations.

Therefore, the authorization heretofore issued for the acceptance of The Masses for mailing at the second-class rates of postage is hereby revoked, and you are requested to enter that fact upon the records of your post office.

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

[United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Second Circuit. Masses Publishing Co. v. Thomas G. Patten, postmaster, etc.]

Motion to stay injunction pendente lite, granted by order entered in southern district of New York and appealed from by defendant.

E. B. Barnes, assistant United States attorney, for motion.

G. E. Roe, for plaintiff, opposed.

Hough, C., as judge:

This motion will be considered under the following heads:

I. The practice under the statute.

II. The present condition of this litigation as to its object and subject matter.

III. The fact findings of the district court and the conclusions there drawn therefrom.

IV. The law as suggested to me by those facts.

V. The propriety of this motion under the circumstances thus developed in respect of—

(1) The rights of parties.

(2) The public interests.

I.

After considerable experience in appellate practice, and such recent inquiry as I have been able to make, no other instance (under No. 129, Judicial Code) of application to a judge of the appellate court to stay on appealed order of this nature is known to me.

Such stays, granted by the trial judge, are not uncommon—I have myself awarded not a few; they rest on the belief that doubtful questions of law or difficult contests of fact (or both) are presented by the record, and that the relations of the parties or exigencies of business are such that—perhaps by the giving of security—no injury will result from letting matters remain in statu quo—except for opinion filed—until decisive action can be had in the court of appeals.

There can be no difference in principle between such an application to the trial judge and a similar one addressed to a member of the appellate court. Indeed, I think a somewhat stricter rule should justly apply.

The trial judge may and often does feel that his findings of fact, reached with travail of conscience, may not be unassailable in the view of others equally capable; yet having done his best he expresses no misgivings, though they exist and strongly move him to grant the stay.

But one who did not hear the case fully tried and argued has, I think, small right to base action on facts. Except in the extremest cases the facts must be assumed as reported from the lower court, whether through judge or jury. Any other attitude on the part of the judge ad quem would convert the motion into a species of irregular and often indecent new trial.

For these reasons it is held that for present purposes the propriety of granting the stay asked rests on a case whose facts are literally as found by the district court. And by facts I mean not only facts physical—phenomena seen or heard—but mental conditions or intents so far as definitely stated.

II.

This action relates only to an alleged property right; that is, the claim of a New York corporation to have certain second-class matter forwarded to destination through the United States mail. Equity is resorted to solely to prevent irreparable pecuniary damage. Defendant justifies under an order of the Postmaster General, and the Department of Justice defends—but all this does not prevent the suit from being one between private parties—in the same sense as that phrase is true of actions against collectors of internal revenue for illegal exaction of taxes. The action is not against the sovereign—technically.

What the bill demanded, therefore, was that the mail aforesaid—namely, sundry copies of The Masses—should be sent forward, and the district court so ordered on July 26.

It now appears that on the day before (decision being known) plaintiff requested defendant to give back the withheld magazines and not forward them, other arrangements for distribution having been made.

This means that plaintiff no longer desires the only avowed object of action; the business foundation of the suit has dropped out. But it remains true that the obligation to distribute this particular issue of The Masses has a most important bearing on any postmaster's duty to forward future or similar publications. Therefore, as long as the prayer of the bill is unfulfilled plaintiff has a legally real subject of litigation, although it further appears that plaintiff is not now exposed to any loss not coverable by damages already liquidated or ascertainable.

Defendant's situation, however, is quite different. The order appealed from, if complied with, fulfills the whole object of suit. If reversed, no restitution or restoration of status quo is possible, and, in my judgment, the appeal becomes a futility, presenting to the appellate court nothing but an interesting moot point.

A court may hold a case sub judice until it becomes moot. The Supreme Court did so lately in the well-known habeas corpus taken out by Hon. H. Snowden Marshall. But could it be pretended that the Supreme Court should or would have taken cognizance of that appeal if brought on for argument after the expiration of the Congress which proceeded against Mr. Marshall? I think not, and therefore strongly incline to the view that this is the rare instance in which an appeal without a stay is not only futile but legally impossible, yet the statute gives the absolute right of appeal.

III.

The facts found may be imperfectly but sufficiently summarized thus: Taking certain pictures and articles in this magazine especially objected to by defendant and drawing no inference from the general tone and previous issues of the periodical—the books now lying undelivered in the post office and the sole subject of this suit—assert that the laws of the United States passed for the creation of military forces and the prosecution of war violate "the fundamental rights of any free people"; that conscription especially "is the destruction of youth, democracy, and labor and the desolation of the family"; that the United States has attempted to "ensnare" Russia into "a continuance of war for purposes prejudicial to true democracy"; that persons (naming them) who have defied and resisted the laws having military success as their object and been duly convicted or otherwise punished for such offenses are worthy of "admiration" and "possible emulation."

It is further found that these specified writings and pictures "may interfere with the success of the military forces of the United States," because this publication and its kind "enervate public feeling at home (which is their chief purpose) and encourage the success of the enemies of the United States abroad (to which they are usually indifferent)."

But all these statements of plaintiff are not "of fact"; they are "within the range of opinion and of criticism; they are all certainly believed to be true by the utterer."

Upon these findings, and the assumption that what is unlawful under the act of June 15, 1917, is unmailable, is based the conclusion of law that the act "forbids anyone from willfully causing insubordination, disloyalty, mutiny, or refusal of duty in the military and naval forces of the United States" and that "to arouse discontent and disaffection among the people with the prosecution of the war and with the draft tends to promote a mutinous and insubordinate temper among the troops." But "if one stops short of urging upon others that it is their duty or their interest to resist the law, one should not be held to have attempted to cause its violation."

Therefore, because no writing or picture of those specifically objected to by the defendant on the hearing (without any reference to the rest of the magazine or its history or environment) "directly advocated resistance" to (especially) the conscription act, the order appealed from was granted.

The foregoing only follows through the findings and conclusion on one subdivision of the act; but that is enough for present purposes.

IV.

The Postmaster General has found as a fact (inter alia) that The Masses sought to promote a mutinous, disloyal, and insubordinate spirit among troops; I think the district court did not disagree as to that. But it was held that because the plaintiff stopped short of urging resistance the law was not violated.

The questions presented, or some of them, are: (1) Is such view of the law correct? (2) Is it so clearly correct that the courts should interfere—for it is admitted that the Postmaster General held that such indirect incitement to disloyalty, etc., as the court found in the magazine, did amount to resisting and therefore violating the law?

This second query must be first answered, for courts do not interfere, except in the clearest cases, with the action of one of the great executive departments in interpreting law affecting that department (Smith v. Hitchcock, 226 U. S., at 58). In my opinion, it is very difficult to answer this question in the affirmative.

As to the second query, it is at least arguable whether there can be any more direct incitement to action than to hold up to admiration those who do act. Oratio obilqua has always been preferred by rhetoricians to oratio recta; the beatitudes have for some centuries been considered highly hortatory, though they do not contain the injunction, "Go thou and do likewise."

At all events, it is a point plainly suitable for the attention of the appellate court.

Behind and beyond these questions of statutory construction, and of how far discretionary action (and all injunctions pendente lite are discretionary) by the judicial department may interfere with executive discretion, lies a fundamental inquiry as to the nature of the Postal Service.

In respect of the mails the United States is certainly not a common carrier; it is pursuing a high governmental duty (Searight v. Stokes, 3 How., at 169; Ct. Re Debs, 158 U. S., at 583), and it is at least arguable whether any constitutional government can be judicially compelled to assist in the dissemination and distribution of something which proclaims itself "revolutionary," which exists not to reform but to destroy the rule of any party clique or faction that could give even lip service to the Constitution of the United States.

V.

(1) So far as the parties are concerned, the present and actual situation is such that any wrong suffered by plaintiff can be wholly redressed by damages, apparently only measured by the expense of the different transportation arrangements now confessedly perfected.

(2) So far as the public interest is concerned, enough has already been said, except to point out that the circuit court of appeals for this circuit has not closed its term; it can be convened at any time on the summons of the senior judge.

The existing stay will be continued on terms specifically set forth in the order filed herewith.

CHAS. M. HOUGH,
United States Circuit Judge.

Dated August 4, 1917.

[United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. Masses Publishing Co. v. Thos. G. Patten, postmaster of the city of New York.]

Upon the return of an order herein requiring plaintiff to show cause why any and all action on its part under and pursuant to the interlocutory order or decree herein—now appealed from—and entered in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York on the 26th day of July, 1917, should not be stayed until the hearing and decision of said appeal, argument was duly had on August 2, 1917, and due deliberation also having been had it is—

Ordered, That the operation of and all acts or actions under said order of July 26, 1917, on the part of the plaintiff be, and the same are, hereby stayed until the hearing and determination of the appeal taken by defendant from said order, or until the further order in the premises of this court, or of the undersigned:

Provided, That within five days of the filing of this order defendant execute and file in this court a good and sufficient bond with surety to the plaintiff, conditioned to pay said plaintiff on demand all such damages and costs as may in this cause and action be awarded to said plaintiff by the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, or on appeal by this court, or by both courts or either. The said bond shall be in and for the sum of $10,000; i. e., it shall cover and protect costs and damages or either or both to the amount of $10,000; further Ordered, That the giving of said bond is a specific condition of this stay, and that if said bond be not executed and filed as hereinabove required the stay hereinabove granted shall ipso facto, terminate and be held for naught.

If after and within three days of the filing of said bond the plaintiff excepts to the form or sufficiency thereof or to both form and sufficiency, such exceptions shall be heard by the clerk of this court, with right of appeal forthwith from his decision to any judge of this court.

C. M. HOUGH,
United States Circuit Judge.

Dated August 4, 1917.

[In the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Georgia. Petitions for habeas corpus. John Story v. H. W. Perkins, deputy United States marshal, and M. G. Whittle, jailer. Albert Jones v. H. W. Perkins, deputy United States marshal, and M. G. Whittle, jailer.]

"L. D. McGregor, Thomas E. Watson, J. Gordon Jones, attorneys for John Story and Albert Jones.

"Erle M. Donalson, United States attorney, for defendants.

"Decided August 20, 1917, at Mount Airy, Ga.

"Speer, Judge:

"Albert Jones and John Story, imprisoned in the Richmond County jail under commitment for unlawfully failing to register for military duty as required by the act of Congress of May 18, 1917, known popularly as the selective-draft law, have made application for writs of habeas corpus. They allege that their imprisonment is unlawful. They charge that the enactment, made to raise a national army, is violative of the Constitution of the United States. It is insisted that the authority exercised by the United States under this legislation is void because the act contravenes the thirteenth amendment. This provides that 'neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as punishment for crime whereof the parties shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction.' To agree to this contention we must conclude that a soldier is a slave. Nothing could be more abhorrent to the truth, nothing more degrading to that indispensable and gallant body of citizens trained in arms, to whose manhood, skill, and courage is, and must be, committed the task of maintaining the very existence of the Nation and all that its people hold dear. The Grand Army of the Republic, the Confederate Veterans, and Sons of Veterans are not maintained to preserve the traditions of slavery. Nations do not pension slaves to commemorate their valor. They do not 'give in charge their names to the sweet lyre,' nor does—

> "Sculpture in her turn
> Give bond in stone and ever-during brass
> To guard and to immortalize the trust.

"The sole additional ground of the petition is that by the common law it was the right of petitioners to 'remain within the realm,' and that this right should now be held to relieve them from military service beyond the borders of the United States. The reply is that the common law—that is, the immemorial English law—can not prevail as to the United States or its people against the explicit provisions of an act of Congress. Nor has a court of the United States power to declare an act of Congress invalid because it is inimical to the common law. The touchstone for such judicial power is the Constitution and nothing else. It remains to be determined whether the Constitution has conferred authority on Congress to enact this law. Clause 11 of Article I, section 8, of the Constitution empowers Congress 'to raise and support armies.' This power is plenary. It is not restricted in any manner. Congress may summon to its army thus authorized every citizen of the United States. Since it may summon all, it may summon any. Said the Supreme Court in the case of The United States v. Tarble (13 Wallace, 408): 'Among the powers assigned to the National Government is the power to raise and support armies; * * * Its control over the subject is plenary and exclusive. It can determine without question from any State authority how the army shall be raised, whether by voluntary enlistment or forced draft, the age at which the soldiers shall be received, and the period for which they shall be taken; the compensation he shall be allowed, and the service to which he shall be assigned.'

"It is urged that by this legislation Congress has taken over and in this way conscripted the National Guard.

"This, it is said, is the State Militia. It is contended under clause 14 of the article and section above quoted that such militia can be used only to execute the laws of the Union to suppress insurrection and repel invasion. Since these petitioners are not members of the National Guard, in no event could their rights in this way be affected. But the National Army is not the militia. An army is a body of men whose business is war, Burroughs vs. Peyton, 16 Gratt., Virginia, 475. The militia is 'a body of men composed of citizens occupied temporarily in the pursuits of civil life but organized by discipline and drill, and called into the field for temporary military service when the exigencies of the country require it.' Idem.

"As we have seen, Congress in the exercise of the power to raise armies may summon to the colors every citizen. It follows that the States, even if they so desire, can not defeat this power by enlisting such citizens in the State troops or National Guard. Was this possible, it would be also possible for the States to prevent altogether the raising of armies by Congress.

"There remains to be considered the contention that Congress can not employ the National Army to be created by virtue of this legislation in foreign lands or beyond the seas. If this is true, then indeed is our country impotent. Then must its people indeed suffer in their own homes, in their cities and on their farms, all the horrors of invasive war. Its military leaders must ignore the settled principle of their science, that the best defensive is the most vigorous offensive. The keen swords of its sons, instead of flashing over the guard of the enemy and piercing his vitals, must be held immovable as if on an anvil to be shattered by the reiterated blows of his hammer. Deprived of our aid in the field, successive defeats will visit and crush our allies. Their lands conquered, their navies taken, we must then in turn, solitary and alone, meet on our own soil the impact of victorious and barbarous legions whose laws do not forbid their service abroad, but which inspire their fierce and veteran armies to deeds of conquest in every clime.

"Was this contention maintainable the misguided men, who for their personal ease advance it, might all too late discover their fatal error. They would discover it in the flaming homesteads, in the devastated fields, in murdered brethren, in outraged wives and daughters, in their lands, their factories, their merchandise, their stock, their all, coolly appropriated by the conqueror, as his own; their institutions destroyed; homeless, landless, and beggars to spend whatever interval of degraded life remains to them in abject slavery to the conqueror. But our organic law does not so shackle the gigantic energies of the great Republic. After the enumeration of the powers of Congress, among them as we have seen, 'the power to raise and support armies,' in clause 17 of Article I, section 8, it provides the power 'to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof.' Here is the great reservoir of power to save the national existence.

"It is said that there is no express power to send armies beyond the sea. True, but there is no express power to enact the criminal laws of the United States, none to convey the public domain, to build a transcontinental railroad, nor to construct the Isthmian Canal, nor to create the Interstate Commerce Commission, nor to declare the Monroe Doctrine, nor to make the Louisiana Purchase, nor to buy Alaska, or to take over Porto Rico and the Philippines. This has all been done under the great power to promote the general welfare, just as the selective Army will be created under the law here assailed, 'to provide for the common defense,' and beyond and above all is the inherent power of every nation however organized to utilize its every man and its every energy to defend its liberty and to defeat the migration to its soil of mighty nations of ferocious warriors, whose barbarous inhumanity for three years has surpassed all others since the death of Atilla, the scourge of God. The writs are denied."

ARTICLE BY OTTO H. KAHN.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a public document an article by Otto H. Kahn on Americans of German origin and the war. I believe it will be very helpful to the German-Americans of this country, and I believe it will be well to have it widely distributed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia asks unanimous consent that the paper he has sent to the desk be printed as a public document.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Senator asked that the matter be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. PENROSE. Let it go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the article will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

DISTRICT ARMORY.

Mr. CURTIS (for Mr. GALLINGER) introduced a bill (S. 2814) to provide for the erection of an armory in the District of Columbia, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CURTIS (for Mr. GALLINGER) submitted an amendment proposing to transfer the plot of land known as reservation 26, in the District of Columbia, to the Commissioners of the District for playground purposes, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, which was ordered to be printed and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

RECESS.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m., Wednesday, August 22, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, August 23, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, August 23, 1917.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, August 15, 1817.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

I. W. W. MENACE.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have received a copy of the Helena (Mont.) Independent, a highly reputable and independent daily newspaper in Montana, of the 19th instant, which contains a very comprehensive article about the activities of the Industrial Workers of the World in Montana and conditions arising therefrom. The owners of the Independent, I am sure, are in no wise financially interested in any mines or smelters, sawmills, lumber camps, or other industrial institutions, and therefore I believe the paper is in a position to speak advisedly and disinterestedly of those conditions. I ask to have put in the RECORD three extracts from that article.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"'Sabotage,' according to William D. Haywood, head of the I. W. W., originally meant 'to push back, pull out, or break off the fangs of capitalism.'

"Whatever it may have meant in the beginning of the so-called I. W. W. movement, which aimed its work of destruction at capitalism, 'sabotage' has come to mean nothing more nor less than a threefold conspiracy against organized society.

"First, the I. W. W. would 'push back, pull out, or break off the fangs of capitalism,' as Haywood says, or rather destroy all industries which they could not take over and operate for their own profit and abolish the wage system.

"Second, the I. W. W. conspire against the various crafts unions, well organized and recognized everywhere, in its mad determination to be the 'one big union.' The I. W. W. is the actual enemy of organized labor and considers a union man who remains loyal to his contract with his employer as big a 'scab' as the man who belongs to no union at all. And they call him a 'scissor-bill.'

"Third, the I. W. W. conspire against the Government of the United States of America and its people by its open efforts to 'keep the soldiers so busy in the western industrial centers they will have no time to fight Germany.'

"Thus 'sabotage' has come to mean a threefold conspiracy against organized society—it is the slogan of the enemies of our industries, the battle cry of those who would crush organized labor and force it to come under the sway of the I. W. W. and it is the watchword of men who every day commit actual treason against the United States and who in any other era would be shot as traitors to the country which has given them life and liberty."

THE I. W. W. PREAMBLE.

[Adopted at the second convention, I. W. W., held in Chicago, September, 1906.]

The working class and the employing class have nothing in common. There can be no peace as long as hunger and want are found among the millions of working people and the few, who make up the employing class, have all the good things of life.

Between these two classes a struggle must go on until the workers of the world organize as a class, take possession of the earth and the machinery of production, and abolish the wage system.

We find that the centering of the management of industries into fewer and fewer hands makes the trade-unions unable to cope with the ever-growing power of the employing classes. The trade-unions foster a state of affairs which allows one set of workers to be pitted against another set of workers in the same industry, thereby helping to defeat one another in wage wars. Moreover, the trade-unions aid the employing classes to mislead the workers into the belief that the working class have interests in common with their employers.

These conditions can be changed and the interest of the working class upheld only by an organization formed in such a way that all its members in any one industry, or in all industries, if necessary, cease work whenever a strike or lockout is on in any department thereof, thus making an injury to one an injury to all.

Instead of the conservative motto, "A fair day's wage for a fair day's work," we must inscribe on our banner, "Abolition of the wage system."

It is the historic mission of the working class to do away with capitalism. The army of production must be organized, not only for the every-day struggle with the capitalists but also to carry on production when capitalism shall have been overthrown. By organizing industrially we are forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old.

I. W. W. TACTICS OR METHODS.

[From The History, Structure, and Methods of the I. W. W., by Vincent St. John, published by the I. W. W. Publishing Bureau, New Castle, Pa.]

As a revolutionary organization the Industrial Workers of the World aim to use any and all tactics that will get the results sought with the least expenditure of time and energy.

The tactics used are determined solely by the power of the organization to make good their use. The question of "right" and "wrong" does not concern us.

No terms made with an employer are final. All peace, so long as the wage system lasts, is but an armed truce. At any favorable opportunity the struggle for more control of industry is renewed.

The Industrial Workers realize that the day of successful long strikes is past. Under all ordinary circumstances a strike that is not won in four to six weeks can not be won by remaining out longer. In trustified industry the employer can better afford to fight one strike than he can six strikes that take place in that period.

The organization does not allow any part to enter into time contracts with the employers. It aims, where strikes are used, to paralyze all branches of the industry involved when the employers can least afford a cessation of work—during the busy season and when there are rush orders to be filled.

The Industrial Workers of the World maintain that nothing will be conceded by the employers except that which we have the power to take and hold by the strength of our organization. Therefore we seek no agreements with the employers.

Failing to force concessions from the employers by the strike, work is resumed and "sabotage" is used to force the employers to concede the demands of the workers.

During strikes the works are closely picketed and every effort made to keep the employers from getting workers into the shops. All supplies are cut off from strike-bound shops. All shipments are refused or missent, delayed, and lost if possible. Strikebreakers are also isolated to the full extent of the power of the organization.

Interference by the Government is resented by open violation of the Government's orders, going to jail en masse, causing expenses to the taxpayers—which is but another name for the employing classes.

In short, the I. W. W. advocates the use of militant "direct-action" tactics to the full extent of our power to make good.

Mr. MYERS. I ask leave to furnish and have put in the RECORD, in addition, a few extracts from official declarations and literature of the I. W. W.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not going to object at all to the articles going into the RECORD.

Mr. MYERS. They are short, and I make them a part of the brief remarks I am going to make.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not going to object, I say to the Senator; but I suggest to the Senator—it seems to me that if we are going to do anything with the I. W. W. proposition at all, we ought to act instead of paying attention to newspaper articles. We can fill the RECORD every day with articles from all the papers of the United States and from individuals upon this question, and it will not assist one iota. If Congress is to act in the matter, we ought to act by law; if a State is to act in the matter, it ought to put its laws into force, and not do so much talking. I wanted to say that much to the Senate.

Mr. MYERS. The further clippings which I ask to be inserted in the RECORD I now send to the desk and ask that they be here inserted in my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Sabotage is to this class struggle what the guerilla warfare is to the battle. The strike is the open battle of the class struggle. Sabotage is the guerilla warfare, the day-by-day warfare between two opposing classes. (Sabotage.)

The I. W. W. is fast approaching the stage where it can accomplish its mission. This mission is revolutionary in character. (The Revolutionary I. W. W.)

We are not satisfied with a fair day's wage for a fair day's work. Such a thing is impossible. Labor produces all wealth. Labor is therefore entitled to all wealth. We are going to do away with capitalization by taking possession of the land and the machinery of production. We don't intend to buy them, either. The capitalist class took them because it has the power to control the muscle and brain of the working industry. Organized, we the working class, will have the power. With that power we will take back that which has been stolen from us. We will demand more and more wages from our employers. We will demand and enforce shorter and shorter hours. If we gain these demands, we are diminishing the profits of the boss. We are taking away his power. We are gaining that power ourselves. All the time we become more disciplined. We become self-reliant. We realize that without our labor power no wealth can be produced. We fold our arms. The mills close. Industry is at a standstill. We then make our proposition to our former masters. It is this: We, the workers, have labored long enough to support idlers. From now on he who does not toil, neither shall he eat. (Revolutionary I. W. W.)

By the "working class," which is waging war upon society and which hopes to institute "the future society," is meant the "proletariat," and the proletariat is thus defined: "We mean a class of laborers, possessing neither property nor specialized skill, who sell their labor power in the open market to the highest bidder, and are able to sell that power only so long as it will produce a profit for the purchaser." (The Advancing Proletariat, p. 14.)

Property—either material or in the form of specialized skill—has ceased to exist for the proletariat; access to the machine is the sole basis of his life. And, following the loss of the property idea, comes a complete revolution in the mental attitude of the worker. Man becomes the dominant factor and all his problems are again translated in terms of human rights. He thinks in the terms of a class, for he now realizes his class position and knows that only as such can he hope to survive. He finds that he must attack the structure of a society based on private property and his point of attack is at the point of production, the point where he daily meets his enemy. His whole attitude is one of opposition—opposition to the property of the master class—an attitude utterly subversive of all modern ethics, morals, religions, and laws—an utterly revolutionary attitude. (The Advancing Proletariat.)

Craft unionism can not survive. (The Advancing Proletariat, p. 13.) Any economic system built upon the rights of property is a confiscatory system. (Ibid., p. 13.) Stripped of his property the "aristocrat of labor" sinks to the level of the common herd. (Ibid.)

Two facts stand prominently in an examination of modern society: First, the proletariat is the subject class; and, second, the special function of the State is to keep the proletariat in subjection. Therefore any organization of the proletariat as a class must at once be considered a menace to the privileged classes and be declared illegal. All the activities of the proletariat furthering its program for a new society must necessarily be revolutionary and be beyond the law. Therefore the Socialist politicians' "legal revolution" idea is regarded as absurd. (Ibid.)

There is but one bargain that the I. W. W. will make with the employing class: Complete surrender of all control of industries to organized workers. (The I. W. W., Its History, Structure, and Methods.)

The I. W. W. disclaims any nationality. (The Revolutionary I. W. W.)

The Industrial Workers of the World is an international movement, not merely an American movement. We are "patriotic" for our class—the working class. We realize that as workers we have no country. The flags and symbols that once meant great things to us have been seized by our employers. To-day they mean naught to us but oppression and tyranny. As long as we quarrel among ourselves over differences of nationality, we weaken our cause, we defeat our own purpose. (The Revolutionary I. W. W.)

Sabotage is defined by official I. W. W. publications in several ways as follows:

"Any conscious and willful act on the part of one or more workers intended to slacken and reduce the output of production in the industrial field, or to restrict trade and reduce the profits in the commercial field, in order to secure from their employers better conditions or to enforce those promised or maintain those already prevailing, when no other way of redress is open.

"Any skillful operation on the machinery of production intended not to destroy it or permanently render it defective, but only to temporarily disable it and to put it out of running condition in order to make impossible the work of scabs and thus to secure the complete and real stoppage of work during a strike."

Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, the noted I. W. W. agitator, describes sabotage under several heads, the principal among which are:

"Adulteration.

"The slowing down of work.

"A general reduction of efficiency.

"Placing kerosene in ovens to make food unfit to eat.

"Intimidation, coercion, and any means necessary to gain the end."

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I take the remarks of the Senator from Utah for what they are worth when he says we should not do so much talking. They can not apply to me. I am not one of those Senators who have consumed an enormous amount of the time of this body and caused Congress to be in session on this 23d day of August when we might have completed all necessary business long ago. I offer these extracts as a part of some remarks that I intend to make at this time. I think the subject is worthy of them and that there is cause for them.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator did not understand that I object to the articles going into the RECORD. I simply wanted to say to the Senator that, as far as I am concerned, I do not care for talk; I am perfectly willing to act. I think that that is the only thing that will ever in any way, shape, or form lessen the evils that are existing to-day through the labors of that organization.

Mr. MYERS. I agree with the Senator that we should act. He can not favor action any more than I.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. PENROSE. I am not going to object. I have on more than one occasion referred to the absurdity of making the RECORD a newspaper-clipping exhibit, but if Senators choose to persist in it and feel that they are the only people who read the newspapers and the rest of the Senate ought to have these newspaper clippings called to their attention, let them go ahead.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have the floor, and under the rules am entitled to it. I intend to exercise my right to make some remarks, and my remarks will not be shortened by such interruptions as that of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I am the judge of my conduct here. Each of the other Senators has received a copy of the newspaper to which I have referred, and if it is not beneath their dignity to learn something of I. W. W. conditions in Montana and other Western States, I commend the article to their attention as being a comprehensive review of those conditions which constitute a serious menace to the country.

The I. W. W. is a criminal organization, devoted to avowedly and professedly criminal objects, and it is a menace to the country. For a number of years it has been a growing menace, and never has it been a greater menace than it is now in this serious crisis, when the Government needs the devoted support, loyalty, and fidelity of all its citizens.

The clippings which I have furnished as a part of my remarks show something of the object, nature, and tendencies of this organization. I have in my possession extracts from other literature of the organization, showing its attitude on other matters of public concern. Its references to the Almighty and to religion are so exceedingly blasphemous and vile that I would not repeat them or have them printed.

A few months ago Montana was never more prosperous. All of its industries were flourishing. Mining, lumbering, agriculture, the production of everything produced in the State was at a high tide of prosperity. Everybody who would work had work. Everybody who wanted work could get work at the highest wages which had ever been known in the State.

The lumber industry, which had gone through a long period of depression for a number of years, was revived and was in full operation and there was a demand for all the products of the State, when suddenly, last spring, about the time of our entrance into the war, the State was invaded by a horde of I. W. W. agitators from the east and from the west. Some came from Minnesota and North Dakota, to the east; others came from the States of Washington, Oregon, and Idaho, to the west, and suddenly upon their advent there was a change in the industrial conditions of the State. Nearly every lumber camp and sawmill in the State was closed down, and some men who wanted to work at good wages were thrown out of employment. The mines were affected by total or partial strikes of their workmen. There were strikes in other lines of industry and still other strikes were threatened. It is reported it was threatened that unless farmers paid extortionately high prices for farm work the crops would be burned and destroyed.

This condition of affairs came about suddenly and simultaneously with the invasion of the State by I. W. W. agitators, one of whom was Frank Little, a notorious and confessed I. W. W. agitator, who came into the State from Arizona, where widespread strikes had been instituted, and he indulged in such inflammatory language and disloyal utterances that he was lynched, presumably by people who were exasperated by his utterances of disloyalty to the Government and his abusive denunciation of the soldiers and other instruments of authority.

Even prior to that time, at the time the draft was to be put into effect, there was a disloyal parade in the city of Butte, which bore a banner with the words "Damn the war" on it, and soon thereafter, with the advent of Little, the strike in Butte spread to an alarming extent and became a very serious menace to the copper production of the State, which is vitally necessary to the Government in the conduct of the war. I have described what followed the advent of outside I. W. W.'s into Montana.

Now, it has been openly charged in the Halls of Congress, I am sorry to say, that this deplorable situation in Montana was due to Mr. John D. Ryan, a highly reputable and respected citizen of Montana, who is president of the Anaconda Copper Mining Co., the principal mining company of Montana. Never was a more untrue or unjust charge made in this country. I am not spokesman for Mr. Ryan. I have not seen him for months. I have not heard a word from him in regard to this cruel and unjust charge. He is now devoting a great part of his time and energies to Red Cross work of the Government, without compensation, and thus serving his country in its time of need to the best of his ability.

All these disturbances in Butte, including a disloyal procession and rioting and lynching, have been charged to Mr. Ryan, when there is not a particle of foundation for such a charge. It is absurd and monstrous to bring such a charge against Mr. Ryan, who has the esteem of the great body of the people of Montana and is a highly respectable citizen of that State. He is president of a mining company employing many men, but until the present strike his company had never had a strike of its employees.

Three years ago there was a serious labor disturbance in Butte, but it arose from two contending factions of the miners' union, each striving to gain mastery of the union, and involved no dispute with the mine owners or the employers, and that was amicably settled, and the miners returned to work and prosperity ensued. Mr. Ryan's company, in all its history, until this strike, so far as I have heard, had never had any open trouble with its workmen. It has paid the equivalent of the highest wages prevailing in the mining industry, as high as any, and its general reputation has been that of fair dealing with its employees.

It is my understanding that the American Federation of Labor is in no wise connected with this strike and is giving it no support, moral or otherwise.

And now it has been suggested in the Halls of Congress that on account of this condition of affairs, brought about, it seems to me, by the invasion of the State by I. W. W., the Government should take hold of the copper mines of Montana. The time may come before the war is over when it would be legitimate, justifiable, and proper and in the interest of the prosecution of the war for the Government to take over the copper mines of the country, but I do not believe it has yet come, and I do not believe it should be done on account of an invasion of the State by I. W. W.

It is true that the strike to which I referred started when there was a fire in a mine in Butte, and a large number of miners lost their lives, but that lamentable and deplorable catastrophe did not occur in one of the mining properties owned by the company of which Mr. Ryan is president. Neither he nor his company is responsible for that fire; they had nothing whatever to do with it. It is unjust and unfair to hold Mr. Ryan responsible for all the disorders, disturbances, and strikes and all the labor unrest in Montana. I believe the most of them grew out of the invasion of the State by I. W. W. agitators, who have made many well-meaning and honest workmen dissatisfied with their condition. There may have been some just grievances, but if so, I believe they were aggravated and inflamed by agitators from outside the State.

Mr. NORRIS. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it would be gratifying to the Senate—I know it would be to me—if the Senator would state just what the dispute is now in that particular company between the company and its workmen.

Mr. MYERS. I am not authoritatively advised of that. I understand that it has come from a number of different sources; I can not speak with authority, but from all that I can learn the chief complaint of the striking miners is of what is known as the rustling-card system. Also they want, I understand, or some want, higher wages and better conditions. There are a number of reasons assigned, but as far as the rustling-card system is concerned, which seems to be the chief complaint, it had prevailed for quite a number of years and had caused no strikes before I. W. W. agitators invaded the State, so far as I ever heard.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator explain just what that is?

Mr. MYERS. I am not conversant with the working details of it, but it is a system by which anyone who desires employment in the mines must file his application and give certain information on a card about himself, to be signed by him. I am not versed in the details of the practice or working of it, but it seems to me, in these serious times, that any employer, whether a mining company or a farmer, is entitled to know something about the character of the people who want to work for it or him. It seems to me that that is a privilege of an employer, unless it be abused. I suppose any privilege may be abused. I do not know whether this one has been abused or not. It is claimed that it has been. Others claim that it has not been.

It seems to me in these serious times it is essential for a mining company to know something of the character of the men who apply to work for it. One applicant for work out of 10,000 might be a man with a malevolent intention or disposition, who, by planting a fuse or something of that kind, could cause an explosion that would destroy millions of dollars' worth of property and hundreds of innocent lives of honest workingmen.

Now, as I have said, I believe that the most of these conditions and disturbances have been brought about by the agitation of nonresident I. W. W. members, who have invaded Montana and stirred up trouble not only in Butte but in other parts of the State. I do not believe that the resident workingmen of Montana, who as a rule are men of good intentions and good faith, are responsible for these conditions. I believe they are a part of the I. W. W. menace which is threatening the entire country in this crisis.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, can the Senator tell us what wages they have been getting and how much they are demanding?

Mr. MYERS. I understand that miners in the mines of Butte are getting, as a rule, $5 or $5.25 a day; I think some as high as $5.75 perhaps. There may be some cause for dissatisfaction; I can not say and I do not say there is not, but I think such cause as there may be, if any, would be greatly lessened and would be much more speedily settled if the pernicious and disloyal activities of the I. W. W. were suppressed.

Now I come to the point that the Senator from Utah spoke of, and I am in accord with him about it, and I have talked longer than I expected. I did not expect to consume more than a few minutes. I have had some interruptions, and I am about to close. I believe there should be legislation directed at the disloyal and pernicious activities of the I. W. W. menace in this country. It appears there is not adequate legislation. It will require legislation to rid the country of this menace, and I have introduced a bill which is aimed at that object. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has introduced two other bills on the same subject. Of course, we expect to do nothing on the subject while the revenue bill is before the Senate, and can do nothing until it is disposed of. I am in hope that these bills of which I make mention will be speedily enacted and put in force, and if so I believe they will very much better the situation.

My idea in these few extemporaneous remarks has been to call the attention of the Senate in a preliminary way to the necessity for legislation and to the menace as it exists in the West, and to call particular attention to the newspaper article of which I made mention. If legislation be enacted to suppress the pernicious and disloyal activities of the I. W. W., I believe that any honest differences between the mine owners and the miners who want work at good wages can be speedily settled, to the benefit and welfare of the country, and that satisfactory industrial relations throughout the West will be resumed.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I present a brief letter from the chairman of the Wyoming State Council of National Defense, which has a direct bearing upon the proposed legislation which has been introduced by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]. I should like to have the letter printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

WYOMING STATE COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE,
Cheyenne, Wyo., August 17, 1917.

Hon. JOHN B. KENDRICK,
United States Senator from Wyoming,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR GOV. KENDRICK: In accordance with the request made by the Johnson County Council of National Defense, the State Council of National Defense of Wyoming asked that the chairman petition you as follows:

"Since the labor situation in Wyoming has grown acute and we need many men to help harvest the increased crop acreage planted this year, there is a shortage of men, due to Wyoming's large enlistment in the Army service; and it being impossible to get many men from outside because the demand for labor is heavy all over the country, it is recommended that since there are a large number of homesteaders on dry lands in this State who are raising little or nothing on their own lands but who can not leave their homesteads and help those who need them because of the necessity of complying with homestead laws as to residence, steps should be taken to support a bill for special relief by Congress excusing all homesteaders in Wyoming from residence on their homesteads from now until December 30."

The State council respectfully petitions that you take especial interest in this matter so that we may have some relief.

Sincerely, yours,

HENRY G. KNIGHT, Chairman.

DEATH OF EX-SENATOR JOHN W. KERN.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I send to the desk, and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD without reading, an account from the Roanoke World News, of Virginia, of the funeral of Hon. John W. Kern, late a Member of this body, and also editorials concerning him which appeared in the leading Indianapolis newspapers the day following his death.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

[From the World News, Roanoke, Va.]

IN THE EVERLASTING HILLS.

The burial of John W. Kern at Kern Cliff on yesterday was in keeping with the character of the man.

One for whom over 6,000,000 of his fellow men had cast their vote for the second highest office in their power to bestow; whom his own State had ever delighted to honor; who had for four years been the leader of his, the dominant, party in the Senate; who had through a great world crisis been the intimate friend and trusted counselor of the President; and who had measured up to the full stature of a man under every test which high office and trying times could apply to him, was laid to rest in the presence of a few friends and neighbors and with a burial service of a sweet and beautiful simplicity appropriate to the strength and gentleness of his exalted character.

Had time and circumstances permitted it, the Nation would have chosen to give a patent expression to its sense of loss; his former colleagues and followers in the Congress would have wished to pay the tribute of their presence, and his casket would have been covered with a profusion of flowers from the thousands who had learned to love as well as honor him.

But his brief last illness was not known to many, and even to these his sudden death was a sad surprise. So when it was decided to bring his body to his summer home in Carvins Cove for burial only a few friends made during his occasional brief stays in Virginia and his neighbors there in the mountains had opportunity to attend his funeral.

These, numbering about 200, assembled at the Kern Cliff home, where the services were conducted under the direction of Dr. George Braxton Taylor, minister at the near-by Enon Baptist Church, and in conformity with the Senator's well-known love of simple and unpretending things. A passage from the Scriptures read by a young man, friend and tutor to his sons; a prayer by Dr. Taylor, the singing of "Abide With Me" and "Come Ye Disconsolate" by a few of the ladies from Hollins, a few words from the heart of his friend, Mr. Lucien H. Cocke, telling of his life and its great service, followed by the removal of the body to the grave, where Mr. Joseph A. Turner closed the service with appropriate prayer, and the body of John W. Kern was laid to its last and perfect rest.

It was at sunset, above the waters of Carvins Creek, on one of the western foothills of Tinker Mountain that he was buried. There his father and his grandfather had lived; there he himself had spent many of the years of his early youth; there he had hoped to find an age of rest from his long life of generous and untiring service to his country; and there he sleeps to-day.

"I lift up mine eyes to the hills from whence cometh my strength," says the Psalmist. So in all ages have said the nations of the world in their hours of trial. The strength of those great mountains woven into the warp and woof of his sturdy ancestry was John Kern's heritage; the serene peace of their silent places was typified in the quality of calmness which was so marked in him; in his heart was the low, deep music of their murmuring waters, and in his soul the majesty of those everlasting hills.

A sweet, a gentle, and withal a masterful life has come to its close, a nation has lost a leader and a statesman, a family has lost a father and a friend, and in the quiet peace of that secluded valley lies his weary body now at rest, but the influence of his great, strong, simple, unpretentious manhood can not die.

JOHN WORTH KERN.

The death of Mr. Kern, which occurred yesterday, will bring sorrow to thousands of people in Indiana, for he was widely known as a man of friendly and kindly nature. Though a strong partisan, he had many admirers among Republicans. For many years Mr. Kern had been prominent in politics. Twice his party's candidate for governor under conditions that made election impossible, and once its candidate for Vice President when success was out of the question. Mr. Kern fought three losing battles in such a way as greatly to strengthen his hold on the people. As Senator he had the confidence and respect of his colleagues, who gladly accepted him as majority leader of the Senate. President Wilson had no more steadfast supporter in that body.

He was, as all know, a man of integrity and character. He made no money out of politics. On the contrary, his participation in public life cost him much. His ambition was to serve the people to the best of his ability. But it is of Mr. Kern as friend and neighbor that the people of Indiana are to-day thinking. To many his death will bring the feeling of personal loss. For even those who met him but casually felt that they knew him, and that he was their friend. He had a keen, though kindly, sense of humor. There was no bitterness in his make-up. Even those who differed with him could not help liking him. He never allowed political antagonisms to degenerate into personal enmity.

There was no selfishness in him, and no trace of commercialism. On the contrary, Mr. Kern, throughout his public life, fought those interests by whose help others have risen to power. The people of Indiana will sympathize with his family in its great affliction, an affliction in which many of them will feel that they share.

JOHN WORTH KERN.

In the death of John Worth Kern Indiana loses one of her favorite sons, whose name probably was familiar to more homes than that of any of his contemporaries. He was one of the conspicuous men of his own State for many years, but it must be said for him that he never assumed any superiority; for in spite of the prominence he attained as the Democratic nominee for the Vice Presidency and the distinction won as floor leader of the United States Senate throughout the first administration of President Wilson, he was not given to boasting of his own achievements. In fact, his great and enduring popularity with the masses in his own State was due more largely to his simplicity of character, his gentle and kindly attitude toward people, than to any quality of leadership and statesmanship he developed.

He loved his State and was a distinct credit to it. No man could be as active as he was for 30 or 40 years in public life without arousing antagonism and criticism, but in both parties he had warm personal friends. He was an intense partisan, and for a long period of years he was at the front fighting the battles of his party. The varying fortunes of the latter were reflected in the life of Mr. Kern. He took to politics naturally, becoming a candidate for the legislature in Howard County when he was barely of voting age. He was ever ready to champion the principles for which his party stood, and because he was defeated twice for governor and for the Vice Presidency he became known as a "leader of forlorn hopes."

A man of less cheerful and optimistic frame of mind would have become discouraged by defeat and would have dropped out of politics, but Mr. Kern accepted his defeats philosophically. His reward came in 1910 when a break in the Republican Party enabled him to win a seat in the United States Senate. His election as floor leader was a great honor that came to him unexpectedly. It is not unlikely that his elevation to that position was due in a great measure to the fact that he was so constituted mentally that it was easy for him to get along with his associates without friction. He was not a party boss in any sense, but he was loyal to his chief and faithful to the obligations imposed upon him.

He was always a man of the people, and in the closing years of his life was known as a stanch champion of labor. Though he was a devoted follower of William J. Bryan, he was loyal to President Wilson and was a Democrat of the most intense, unchangeable type. Whatever differences his opponents may have had with him, no one could take from him the high regard in which he was held by thousands of people who loved him simply as John Worth Kern, a man of sweet and gentle impulses. By them his loss will indeed be felt. It is decidedly to his credit that he made his own way in life so successfully; that he broadened his vision as he grew older; and that in the face of poor health he never attempted to shirk his responsibilities.

WAR REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I present a letter from Mr. Charles S. Keith, of Kansas City, Mo., in favor of the so-called Bankhead amendment to the pending revenue bill, which I should like to have printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CENTRAL COAL & COKE CO.,
Kansas City, Mo., August 20, 1917.

Hon. CHARLES CURTIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am in receipt this morning of your favor of the 16th instant relative to the war-revenue bill, and I appreciate very much, indeed, the kindly attitude that you have taken in connection with my suggestions to you on this matter.

In this connection I am sending you a compiled statement of the earnings of 28 sawmill companies, having a production of one-seventh of the total yellow-pine production of the South, wherein you will note the earnings of these companies, by years, for 1912, 1913, 1914, 1915, and 1916, and from which you can readily see that the taking of any particular set of years as a basis for the assessment of war taxes might work very much of a hardship upon us.

I would direct your especial attention, as an illustration of what I mean, to the earnings of 1914 and 1915. Assuming that this same condition had applied in 1911 and 1912—and, if you will notice, 1911 and 1912 show red-ink figures for 7 out of the 24 months—these companies would have lost over $5,700,000, or an average loss of approximately $2,800,000 per annum.

Now, if the tax were to be assessed as at present contemplated on 1916 earnings—when these same companies earned $4,206,000—using as a basis the loss of $2,800,000, as above mentioned, these companies would be paying a tax of 50 per cent on $7,000,000, or $3,500,000, and this would leave them only $700,000 profit to carry on their business and renew their properties, on a production of 2,500,000,000 feet of lumber.

I think you can readily appreciate that this would be manifestly unfair. Now, if, on the other hand, we would make exempt from the surtax 8 per cent of the cash value of the assets of these companies at the beginning of the accountancy period for which the tax was to be assessed, and then make the surtax apply over and above that, with a normal tax on the 8 per cent, it seems to me that that would be a fair, honest, and reasonable way of handling this tax.

Unfortunately the lumber and coal business in the United States during the period which it is proposed to take as a basis for these taxes were extremely unprosperous. As a matter of fact, conditions following the anthracite strike of 1902, bringing on an extremely prosperous year in 1903, so speeded up development and improvements that the production has largely exceeded since that time the consumption of the product. The situation in the Southwest has been better than the situation east thereof, but the State of Illinois, for instance, has had capacity enough, and has it to-day, to produce in five months as much coal as the State will consume in 12 months. This resulted in 1914 in the idleness of 40,000 men in the State of Illinois, and if the car situation were such to-day that the production could be put out, Illinois would still be producing more coal in 7 months than the State would consume in 12 months. All of this for the purpose of indicating that the effect of supply and demand upon market conditions and market prices has resulted in extremely unfavorable conditions in the coal business since 1903.

After the panic of 1893 the lumber business continued on the down-hill grade until 1897, at which time the consumption of the United States caught up with the production of lumber and resulted in rising values, which, during the period of exploitations in the early nineties and the building of more railroads and cars brought about an extremely heavy consumption of lumber and a very large increase in production and development, so that since the panic of 1907 up to the last three-quarters of the year 1916 there has been an overproduction of lumber and a consequent reduction of values. Under present conditions, with a shortage of labor and the extraordinarily heavy demand for lumber for Government cantonments and shipbuilding material, factory consumption, and other sources, the situation is more prosperous; but if you take the years 1911, 1912, and 1913 as the basis for the assessment of these war taxes you catch a most unprosperous period for both the lumber and the coal business and will work a direct hardship on them if they are forced to pay a surtax based on earnings over and above the average earnings for those particular years. The fact of the case is, as I have tried to set out in the above, until very recently the lumber and coal business have not been prosperou since the panic of 1907.

With personal regards, I am,

Respectfully, yours, CHAS. S. KEITH,
President.

NOTE.—The cost as used for the year 1915 is the average cost as compiled from data furnished by these various companies for the year 1914, no cost figures having been assembled for the year 1915.

Mr. CURTIS. I also present a telegram from the governor of Kansas in reference to the increased rates proposed on first and second class mail matter in the pending revenue bill, which I should like to have printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TOPEKA, KANS., August 21, 1917.

Hon. CHARLES CURTIS,
Washington, D. C.:

Publishers will cheerfully contribute any percentage of profits that may be levied upon business in general, but any increase in postal rates will only tend to cripple a great industry already seriously hampered by enormous increases in cost of production. The Government needs as never before the assistance of the farm press. I urge that present postage rates be undisturbed.

ARTHUR CAPPER.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, since the revenue bill which is now before the Senate was reported from the committee and I became familiar with its provisions, I have been firmly impressed that the bill should be so amended as to more equitably impose the tax burdens upon the wealth of this country upon those who are more able to bear them and thereby eliminate from this measure provisions which seek to reach and burden the great rank and file of the people of this country by consumption or direct taxes. I do not agree with the policy of the measure which seeks to exempt a very large part of the war profits from taxation and at the same time shift the burden upon the man in this country who is a consumer. I do not believe that we should exempt 70 to 90 per cent of the war profits, and, in order to make up the deficit on account of that exemption, then in turn impose a tax upon tea and coffee and sugar and molasses and other articles that are consumed by the great masses of this country, also a tax on every shipper of freight, on every person who purchases a railroad ticket, a tax on every person who mails a letter and who uses the parcel post.

I believe, Mr. President, that we should impose a greater tax upon incomes. I do not believe that the percentages as fixed in the measure as reported to the Senate impose such a tax as should be imposed upon the fabulous incomes of this country under the impending necessity. Therefore, Mr. President, I am in favor of amending the bill so as to raise a greater amount of the revenue necessary by increasing the tax upon large incomes.

I am also in favor of increasing the tax upon excess war profits. I believe in this way we can raise a substantial part of the necessary revenue; and by raising the necessary revenue through these sources we can eliminate the tax suggested upon coffee, tea, sugar, and molasses, the tax suggested upon the parcel-post package, and the tax suggested upon the shipper of freight and express and purchasers of railroad tickets. I do not believe that a proposition which favors the exemption of a large percentage of excess war profits, and on account of that exemption shifts the burden to people, for instance, who are patronizing the parcel post, who necessarily have to patronize the railroad companies, is right in policy or in principle at this time.

We have said to the young manhood of this country from 21 to 31 years of age, "We ask of you, if need be, that you sacrifice your lives upon the altar of your country; that pending this conflict your opportunity of building for the future, your opportunity of gathering together any little accumulations which may assist you in success in after years shall at least be suspended, if you survive this war, during the period in which we are engaged in the conflict."

By drafting our young men and calling them to arms for their country as the necessity has required we have eliminated their opportunity even of making an income or even of acquiring meager accumulations during this period. Therefore, I feel that if it is right to conscript them, to call upon them to sacrifice their service and, in a great many instances, their lives in behalf of their country, we can not with proper grace plead here for exemption against conscripting the wealth of the country. Our young men of military age are patriotic; they are loyal to the flag; they are responding nobly to their country's call. I do not mean, Mr. President, that we should go so far in taxing incomes or that we should go so far in taxing war profits that we would impose unnecessary hardships upon those who, perchance, are so fortunate as to have those incomes and to reap those profits, but it is my opinion that we can easily raise the amount of taxes upon incomes and upon excess war profits without inflicting any great hardship upon the people of this country who are able to pay them.

What do you think, Mr. President, the young manhood of this country, who are going forth to rally around our flag and to fight to defend the honor of this country, will say if you tell them that you had such solicitous feeling in regard to large incomes, although you have demanded and required of them their services, you propose to allow a man who is receiving, say, fifty thousand, one hundred thousand, five hundred thousand, or a million dollars a year income a very large exemption on that income? It is just as necessary, Mr. President, to raise the revenue to carry on this war as it is to have the men to fight the battles. It is the policy of the country to select its young manhood to carry on the actual fighting upon the firing line, and I say, Mr. President, I am firmly convinced that it is also right and proper to say to those who are holding the wealth of this Nation, those who are able to pay the taxes, "Now that we have called upon the stalwart manhood of our country to fight our battles upon the firing line, we are going to call upon you, who are able, to bear our financial burdens; to bear that part of the hardship which war necessarily inflicts." Our manhood's patriotism should not wane in bearing the Nation's arms; it shall not. Let the wealth of the country also be patriotic and be willing to bear their burdens of this war.

I think that this measure contains a number of provisions which should be eliminated. I think we should eliminate the provision imposing a tax upon coffee, tea, sugar, molasses, or sirups, and other articles of consumption, and I think we should not impose the income tax upon a single man receiving only $1,000 per year and on a married man receiving only $2,000 per year, as is provided by this bill. Certainly, the people of our country who are only making a reasonable living should have a larger exemption, and the bill should be so amended.

Take the tax in this measure levied upon molasses. It is a direct tax upon the producer of this country—a direct tax upon the farmer. It is the only instance in the bill that I recall where it is sought to tax directly the producer. It provides that 2 cents per gallon shall be paid upon molasses and sirups by the importer or the producer. We all know, Mr. President, that the molasses and sirup which are consumed in this country are not imported, but that they are of our own production.

I have not been able to become reconciled to the position of the committee and of a number of the other distinguished Senators who are so solicitous in behalf of having the inheritance tax eliminated, and at the same time favor and urge that a tax, for instance, should be imposed upon parcel post and upon commodities of consumption. I believe, Mr. President, that the inheritance tax on large estates should not have been eliminated. I do not know of any property upon which a tax can be more justly applied.

Of course, it was argued that we should leave this source of revenue to the States. Much more aptly, I say, Mr. President, could it have been contended that the annual excise tax which is imposed upon the user of automobiles could have been left to the States. When we attempt to impose a tax upon the user of automobiles, then most assuredly we invade the field of taxation of the States of the Union.

We know that excise or occupation taxes, as they are designated in the States, upon automobiles are one of the customary and familiar means of raising revenue. I voted, Mr. President, against imposing a direct tax upon the users of automobiles in this country. I felt the manufacturers who have enjoyed splendid profits, or a great many of whom at least have enjoyed even exorbitant profits during the last few years, many of them having amassed enormous fortunes out of the business, should have the tax imposed upon them, and that it should not be imposed upon those who use the automobiles and who, under the present policy of the States and the cities of the country, are already required to pay a considerable tax as an occupation or a license tax upon the use of the automobile.

I do not favor the policy in the bill regarding the exemption of the profits of corporations under the method prescribed for ascertaining the war profits by first determining the prewar profits. As I analyze that feature of the bill, it seems to me it places a premium upon the business concerns which during the prewar period sought to make enormous and abnormal profits out of the people with whom they were doing business. The portion of the bill to which I now refer provides that corporations shall have an exemption equal to their prewar profits and that such profits shall be ascertained by reference to the basic years of 1911, 1912, and 1913. Therefore, Mr. President, the corporation that made enormous profits during those years shall have as an exemption unreasonable profits, while the corporation which was making a resonable profit shall only be exempt to that extent. The measure is discriminatory in its application. This rewards the corporation which was charging exorbitant prices and making exorbitant profits prior to the war, but penalizes the industries of this country which were satisfied with moderate profits, or perchance, were not making any income upon their investment. I think that the tax should be based upon the war-profit earnings and not upon the system as suggested in this measure. The measure, as proposed by the Senate committee, would make large exemptions to companies making abnormal profits prior to the war.

Entertaining these ideas, Mr. President, and believing that there is no necessity at the present time for inflicting unnecessary tax burdens upon the consumers of the country in the nature of the various taxes which I have heretofore enumerated, because we can, by amending this bill, provide the necessary revenue by imposing proper taxes upon the wealth of the country, which is amply able to bear the burden, without inflicting any hardship upon them. I am heartily in favor of amending the measure so as to bring about these results.

I may not agree in every detail with the amendment now pending before the Senate, but entertaining as I do these views, that the tax burden should be borne by those who are amply able to bear and capable of carrying the burden, instead of by shifting it to those who are already enduring hardships, those who are already feeling the weight of their burdens, I propose to support the amendment which is now pending before the Senate providing for an increase in the tax imposed on large incomes. The people of this country who are receiving a normal or possibly a meager wage, the people of this country who enjoy but small or moderate incomes are not in a position to profit during this war. Instead of their opportunity to build for the future being enhanced, instead of their opportunity for accumulating being greater, instead of their opportunity being increased for bringing about a greater degree of happiness in their homes it is lessened. Then why, sir, unnecessarily impose upon them a burden which can be borne by the wealth of the country? The poor people of this country are patriotic. In the hour of the Nation's peril they will always fearlessly and loyally do their duty as American freemen. To tax the man of moderate means when his earnings are so small a hardship would be imposed upon himself and his family. A larger tax upon the rich, upon the swollen fortunes of the country, will impose no hardships, will not deprive any citizen or his family of their comforts and luxuries.

I shall support, Mr. President, the amendment that is now pending before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, in times like these statesmen can afford to be honest with themselves and candid with their constituents. In war times the individual and all he possesses belong to the Government, if the Government needs him and it, in the prosecution of the war. The Congress is now engaged in the arduous and difficult task of raising revenue with which to defray the expenses of the Government in conducting this war, and of course the thing needful to be done must be done.

Men between 21 and 31 years of age have been conscripted to do the fighting. They were not consulted about that. They must give their lives in defense of the Nation's flag whether they will or not. The strong iron autocratic hand of conscription has been laid upon them and the sovereignty of private citizenship has been transferred to the Chief Executive of the Republic. It was an unfortunate departure from the time-honored custom of this Republic, from the days when the private citizen was the ruler and the officeholder but the people's hired man, but under the pressure of the autocratic spirit, which seems to be in the ascendancy throughout the world to-day, the Congress yielded and this unfortunate piece of legislation was put upon the statute books. It now becomes the duty of the Congress to raise the necessary money with which to pay the bills of the war. The amount demanded staggers the conscience and strains the imagination, so great the magnitude. The far-reaching influence of this enormous tax levied upon the generations living and those yet to come will be felt in all the walks of life, falling most heavily upon the people who toil. It is my judgment, Mr. President, that the most just and the least burdensome of all taxes that can be levied upon the people of America at this time, or at any time, is a tax upon incomes and excess profits. Under that system of taxation a man pays in proportion to what he has, and from what he has received from society for his services.

Mr. President, I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], if somewhat modified or extended, is a good law in time of peace, and I regard it as a most excellent law in time of war. I would amend the amendment proposed by the able Senator from Wisconsin by increasing the tax on the larger fortunes; but, taking it as it is, it is far preferable, in my judgment, to the measure proposed by the majority of the committee. It must not be forgotten that the system of income taxes and taxes on excess profits and the further tax on liquors which are embraced in the scheme proposed by the minority of the Finance Committee will take the place of the tax upon the necessaries of life carried in the bill reported by the majority of the committee. Upon whom will fall the burden of taxation which this so-called La Follette amendment imposes if enacted into law? Who and what character of men are protesting through the newspapers and otherwise against the enactment of this proposed amendment? I think if Senators will consult their memories and indulge in a little retrospection, they will find that it is that peculiar type of gentleman known for the last three years as the patriotic advocate of "preparedness," the man who paid for the bunting that decorated the houses, who paid the bills for the bands that furnished the music for the preparedness parades, who bought the flags that were flaunted in the air by the hired claquers along with the real patriots who marched in the parade, who rented the screens in the moving-picture theaters to show the necessity for organizing a great army and a great navy and to demonstrate our utter unpreparedness for defense. That class of men who capitalize their pretended patriotism and who have made fabulous fortunes out of war contracts are the men who are now protesting against the enactment of the La Follette amendment or similar legislation.

It should not be forgotten, Mr. President, that these same patriots for pelf are now trying to make it appear that those of us who are endeavoring to put the burden of the expenses of this war upon that class of men who have profited by the war are guilty of disloyalty to the administration. But that is in keeping with the policy of certain Senators and newspapers. I shall not animadvert upon their conduct, rather preferring to leave to time and trial the determination of the question as to who is right in this controversy. I am willing to submit to the judgment of the American people the wisdom and unselfishness of my course, since it has the unqualified approval of my own conscience and sense of duty. But, O God, I do hope the patriotic white voters of this country may wake up and take notice. The hope of the future of this Republic lies with the patriotic plain man who will not sell his ballot for money or barter his manhood for place.

I confess that I am unable to find an objectionable feature in the proposed amendment save those that I have mentioned. Increase the tax on swollen fortunes and the amendment will be practically perfect. The suggestion that the income and excess-profits taxes should be held in reserve for another levy of taxes strikes me as being rather thin and flimsy, without sufficient spissitude to fool anybody. If the war ends, there will be no excess profits, and therefore no taxes can be levied upon them, because the result will be that the patriots who were influential in bringing on the war will get away with their booty, and we all know it will be utterly futile to talk about enacting a law that will be retroactive in its effect. But the plain, patient toiler, the men of moderate means, are always here, and therefore subject to taxation. Would it not be prudent to hold them in reserve and only tax them when the other method fails? Congress can lay its hands on the excess profits now, which amount to more than $6,000,000,000—the value of the cotton crop of America for seven years, and I submit that it should be conscripted before it gets away. Let this money, coined of the blood of the soldiers and the tears of the women and children, be compelled to pay a part of the expenses of war.

Mr. President, revenue is needed now, just as soldiers are needed, and all patriotic men who have more wealth than they need to meet the responsibilities of their homes and those dependent upon them will not object to these taxes. If a man is a traitor who refuses to give his life in the defense of the flag, what character of monster is the man who will decline to give a part of his wealth—wealth which he does not need for the necessaries of life—what sort of monster is he who will decline to give his surplus wealth for the defense of his Nation in time of war? Are the dollars of the munition manufacturers more sacred and holy than the precious son of a loving mother or the devoted husband of a faithful wife? I want to say, Mr. President, that the citizen who will take advantage of the exigencies of the war to grow rich on the misfortunes of his country and the unhappy state of his countrymen is the most despicable and undeserving of all citizens. He is the basest and most abandoned of all traitors.

Mr. President, it is generally understood that this war was brought about and entered upon without my approval or consent; but we are in it, and we are in it to win. At this or any other time when the opportunity presents itself I should like to have the President of the United States extend to the nations involved in this brutal, inhuman conflict—which I have on other occasions characterized as an impeachment of our Christian civilization and gives the lie to our pretended faith in the Prince of Peace—an opportunity to come to some understanding whereby honorable peace could be restored. The people of Europe are not permitted to speak their honest thoughts and will not so long as the war continues. They are under the command of a military despot and dare not give expression to their views. But it is my judgment that if the people of Germany were permitted to act as freemen, they would dethrone the Kaiser in 24 hours. Even in free America the strong hand of the censor has been laid upon certain editors who, while they may have been indiscreet, are nevertheless exercising their constitutional rights in criticizing their public servants. I, perhaps, more than any other man in public life have been the victim of a mendacious and slanderous press, but I prefer to suffer that injustice rather than muzzle the press. Their lies will do no harm as long as truth is free to combat them. Certainly it could not do any harm to give the belligerent nations a chance to consider a proposition for peace, and if it should hasten the day for the restoration of peace it might be the means of saving millions of men and billions of dollars, together with broken hearts and the blighted lives of the loved ones of those who may fall in the forefront of battle.

But if the war must be carried on—and I see no way around it, unless the President, as I suggest, should end it—it must be done effectively, with verve, vigor, and relentless determination. But, let the duration of the war be long or short, I do most heartily desire that the policy of our Government be such in the levying of taxes as to remove all taint or suspicion of war for financial conquest or pecuniary gain.

No nation on earth was ever confronted with the situations such as this country is confronted with at this moment. The problems which we are called upon to solve are unique in character and far-reaching in their consequences, and I fear will be exceedingly difficult to handle. We are fighting a country 3,000 miles away across the seas—seas that are infested with the rapacious submarine—and it has fallen to our lot, it seems, to furnish men and money with which to carry on the war until the common cruel enemy shall be exhausted. We went into this war side by side with autocratic Russia. At that time a Czar ruled with an iron hand, the people were, as dumb cattle, driven to the slaughter. Democratic Russia grew tired of fighting, as they had a right to do. I wish the people of Germany would do likewise. The people of Russia were not consulted about going into the war, and therefore they felt that they were not in honor bound to carry on the war. It is my belief, and has been all the time, that Russia will not be able to rally her forces for the further continuation of the war; but, for the good of America, I hope she may be able to restore order and carry her part of the war to a successful issue. All of this, Mr. President, shows the danger and unwisdom of the United States forming entangling alliances with the kingdoms of Europe, whose rulers never consult the wishes or the interests of their people. It further shows how profoundly wise and patriotic were those incomparable statesmen, Washington and Jefferson.

It is all right for us to furnish money to our allies; but, do you know, the thought of hiring anybody to do the fighting for the United States does not set well on my constitution. I recall, Mr. President, the contempt in which I was taught in my youth to hold the man who hired another man to represent him in doing a citizen's duty on the field of battle—in other words, hiring a substitute. I can not conceive of anybody or any character more contemptible—a creature who more completely disgraces the image of his Maker—than a man who would hire another to do his fighting in time of war. There are a few survivors of the period of the Civil War who took advantage of the exigencies of that war between the States to feather their nests while their substitutes were fighting for them on the field of battle. That class of men are now very impatient with anybody who dares to make a suggestion of bringing about an early peace or hasten the end of the war. I would not trust such a creature under any circumstances. Treachery is the gush of his genius, and the price of his soul is the thing he wants. I am decidedly in favor of America doing a man's part in this war if she is to do anything at all. And from the outlook she is going to do it.

Mr. President, I expect our boys at the front, God bless them, to do their duty. Patriotism with the American citizen is a common attribute. The coward and the slacker are exceptions to the rule. I will be pardoned if I suggest just at this point, that it is my judgment that every man who volunteered—mark you, I said volunteered—his services in this war, this morning desires to go to the front. They are all patriotic. Every white American soldier will do his duty, whether he be a conscript or a volunteer. There is no question, I repeat, about the patriotism and courage of the American youth. If permitted, they would have offered their services without compulsion, but another method was employed for raising an army, and I do not desire to be understood as criticizing anybody at this time for it. But I shall never consent that conscription shall be the established policy of this Government. I was made very happy a few days ago to have the assurance from my boy, who has recently received a commission in the volunteer service, that it is his desire to go where the shot and shell fall the thickest. I should have been disappointed if I had found that he felt any other way about it. I am sure his comrades share his thoughts and aspirations on the subject. While I deprecate the war, and I wish that I had been able to have averted it, but since it has come and my country is involved, I would to God that my circumstances were such that I might go with the young men, and share their hardships and their sacrifices. But, Mr. President, that privilege will be denied me. I must be content to do my bit in some other way.

In the matter of levying taxes, let us put the burden upon those most able to bear it. Let us take the tax off of the breakfast table and the other necessaries of life. Do not, for God's sake, tax the food that sustains the starving babe, that nourishes the tired and poorly clad mother and the overworked laborer, whose toil keeps the wheels of commerce rolling, while there are billions of excess profits hoarded in the coffers of the corporations of this country. Let the wealth of the present generation, as largely as possible, pay the expenses of this war. Do not put the burden upon posterity. Do not require the men who are fighting our battles and their children and childrens' children in the years to come to pay the debts that this generation ought to bear. Let us not, for God's sake, bequeath this legacy of disaster to our children. They will have enough troubles of their own, and I submit that it is cowardly and unjust for the present generation to impose upon the future generations those burdens that we ourselves should carry. It is my thought that if war expenses could be fixed upon the generations that bring about war it would be a strong incentive for world peace. There is no doubt but that war contracts are a potential influence in creating public sentiment favorable to war. We have seen that demonstrated. I do not charge that that is the sole cause of this war, but I do charge, without the fear of successful contradiction, that some of the largest fortunes ever amassed by man have been made out of this war. And those same men are the ones who are now trying to escape taxation and put the burden of the expense of this war upon posterity. If the sufferings, the sorrows, and sacrifices which war imposes were forced upon the leaders, the rulers of the world, we would have no more wars. And America is not an exception to that rule.

Now, in conclusion, I repeat, Mr. President, let us not require the children of the young men who are doing battle at the front, and who must tote the load and suffer the almost infinite sacrifices of this war, to pay the larger part of the expenses of the war.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is in the nature of a substitute for the income-tax rates carried in the bill as reported to the Senate by the Finance Committee.

The Finance Committee is composed of 17 Senators, the great majority of them Senators who have had long service in this body, who have been returned often to this Chamber by the vote of their constituents. As has been stated before by myself and others, the Finance Committee gave many weeks of consideration to this bill, especially to the first two titles of this bill, because they are away and beyond the most important provisions of the measure.

As has been stated before, during all of these deliberations there was no open manifestation in that committee, absolutely no evidence, that anybody there was seeking to lift burdens off of one class of the people of this country and place them upon another class. There was no evidence that anybody around that board desired to protect especially any industry of his section. I think I can say with absolute safety, Mr. President, that if any mistakes have been made by the committee they did not grow out of any purpose on the part of any member of the committee to distribute improperly the burdens and the expense of war.

Of course, I understand that it is a very easy matter for gentlemen who have not had to wrestle with these questions, who are opposed to the final action of the committee, or who for any other reason do not like the method which is recommended by the committee for raising this money, to try to call to their aid certain well-known class prejudices in this country. There is not, in my opinion, one line or one provision in this bill that justifies the charge that some Senators have seen fit to make against the bill that it attempts to impose unduly the burdens of this war upon men of small means while dealing lightly with men of large means.

I want now to make a solemn appeal to Senators on this side of the Chamber who have not read or studied this measure that they carefully read and study this bill and the reports thereon.

I am satisfied that if they will put themselves in possession of the information and the facts, understanding thoroughly the provisions of the bill in its application of these facts, they will reach a conclusion that this committee has dealt equitably and fairly with all interests in the imposition of these taxes.

Mr. President, if the income-tax rates contained in the Senate committee bill as it was amended here yesterday are unjust to the men of moderate means in this country, if they display favoritism to the men of large incomes in the country, then the amendment or the substitute which the Senator from Wisconsin has offered fn tenfold degree deals unjustly with the men of moderate means and in tenfold degree deals favoredly with the men of large incomes.

Gentlemen say they want to support the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin because they want the swollen fortunes, the great incomes, the profits of the millionaires, to bear the burden and not the small incomes of men of moderate means.

There never has been written and proposed to a legislative body as ingenious a scheme to lift the burden from the big incomes and put it on little incomes as the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin. If his ingenuity had been ten times as great as it is, if he had called to his assistance the sinister cunning of all those who deal unjustly with men of small incomes, he could not have written to more successfully accomplish that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. In this connection I simply want to ask any Senator if he can justify the proposition, as it will be found in the fact that under the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin on incomes exceeding $13,000 and not exceeding $15,000 there is to be collected $144,220,197 out of the total tax in those two brackets?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, there are those who do not believe in this stupendous war in which we are engaged. They are not in sympathy with the Government in its entrance in that struggle. They are not in sympathy with any of the measures which the Government has seen fit and necessary to take in order to bring the conflict to a successful issue. I make no personal application, but I do say, Mr. President, that that class of people in this country—I am not speaking about the Senate now—have been demanding, first, that we pay all the expenses of the war by taxation, and that this year and this generation shall bear the whole burden. They are exceedingly sensitive about placing even a small fraction of it upon future generations. Their conscience is punctured to the very core at the suggestion that the men who are to come 50 years from now, when these bonds become due, may have to pay some of the expenses of the war. They want it all placed upon the burdens of the people of this country now, right now—$10,000,000,000—$12,000,000,000—raise it by larger taxation.

Mr. President, I charge no man with wrong, but I do charge that the inspiration of that suggestion when carried to the extent that it has been carried by some in this country finds its genesis in hostility to the war itself, in a desire to make that war as unpopular as is possible. We all know that people, neither in peace times nor in war times, like taxes. We all know that you can not make a cause more unpopular in this country or in any other country than by imposing upon the people a burdensome and oppressive rate of taxation. For that reason, not only in our wars but in the wars of other countries, not only to-day but in past generations throughout the whole history of man, wars have been paid for generally more largely by the issuance of bonds than by taxation.

Yet, Mr. President, the demand comes from some sources that practically all this money shall be raised by taxation, and where the circumstances are such as to make that sort of an appeal obnoxious to the common sense of the body to which it is made it is somewhat changed, and it comes in the form of an appeal that two-thirds or three-fourths of the money shall be raised by taxation. There is no desire to spare the people who live here now. There is no desire to spare the people who are furnishing their sons to the cause, no desire to spare the people who are burdened and laboring under the load that this war has necessarily imposed upon them. Pile it higher and higher upon them. In Heaven's name, however, do not allow any portion of it to be passed on to those who are to come after us, and who are to enjoy the benefits of our success in this war, if we shall win it, as much as we shall.

Mr. President, I want to say this about the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin before I begin to analyze it. If you want to make this bill unpopular with the masses of the people of this country, the people of small and moderate incomes, if you want to make the load that is imposed upon them already heavier and heavier, if you want to exact from them an unfair proportion of the expenses of this war, then you can do it and do it very effectively by adopting the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

If we should undertake to raise all the money for this war by taxation it would make it an unpopular war. If we shall undertake to raise a part of the money in a way that will be oppressive to the man of small income and light upon the man with a large income, that would be unpopular in this country. I say the bill as presented by the Senate Committee does not do that, and I do say that the amendment presented to this body by the Senator from Wisconsin does do that and nothing else but that. You could not write into this bill a provision that would make it more unpopular, a provision that would tend more to shift the burden from wealth and put it on moderate incomes, small incomes, than by the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. President, let us look at the amendment. The amendment deals with individual incomes. We have not reached corporate incomes yet; we are dealing with individual incomes. Under the bill every man in this country, every woman in this country, who has an income in excess, under the bill, of $2,000 is subject to this income-tax law; subject to it, however, in different degrees according to the income. When your committee was considering the bill in order that it might bring about equality of burdens, in order that it might call upon the whole resources of the United States for its equitable contribution to the expenses of the war, when it reached the excess profits of the bill it radically changed the House scheme, which applied that law only to corporations and copartnerships by bringing in and making subject to the law the income from the business of all individuals and citizens of the country. So, Mr. President, the individuals who are subject to this income-tax law are also subject to the excess-profits tax law. The individual first must pay the rate prescribed in that section of the bill running from 12 per cent up to 50 per cent, according to the amount of earnings, a tax upon whatever he may earn on the farm, in the mines, in the factory, in the storehouse, wherever he is engaged in carrying on his business. Whatever income he earns over and above the exemption which is allowed to individuals he must pay his excess-profits tax upon it at this rate, and after he has paid that excess-profits tax he must then pay his income tax upon the balance. It is not subject to one tax only, as it has been heretofore. It is not subject only to the income tax, but before it reaches that stage of taxation it must bear the additional burden which has been placed upon the individual.

Taking all this into consideration your committee thought that the amounts that it had prescribed for the income tax, especially in view of the fact that the individual had been made subject to the excess-profits tax, were quite high enough.

Mr. President, another thing, too. In imposing this income tax, these additional rates on the incomes after they had been subjected to the excess-profit tax, we thought that we ought to deal gently, if you will permit me to use that word, with a man of small income, that we ought not to impose upon him a tax bearing anything like the proportionate tax that we impose upon the large income. So we begin our surtaxes at $5,000, and then we run it up by good leaps where the incomes are small, and by small increases, and as the incomes grow large and larger the increases grow large and larger so as to make it light upon the man at the bottom and heavy for the man at the top.

Now, the Senator from Wisconsin has reversed that process and has laid the burden of his increase upon the small income. The Senator has explained to you this step proposition. He said if you wanted to be equitable and fair, bring your steps close together. Mr. President, if you want to make a burden heavy, you will bring your steps close together, too.

What has the Senator done? He has started with $5,000. The first increase in the tax of 1 per cent begins there, and then every time he goes up a thousand dollars he adds another per cent to the tax rate. He follows that scheme. Every time the income increases a thousand dollars he adds another 1 per cent to the surtax until he reaches incomes of $30,000. When he reaches incomes of $30,000 he has reached a maximum rate of 25 per cent increase in the surtax.

His total increase is 45 per cent, I believe, upon incomes of over a million dollars and yet of this 45 per cent increase 25 per cent is levied upon incomes of less than $30,000. He has, therefore, laid more than half the burden of his increases not upon the highest possible incomes, not $1,000,000, not $10,000,000, not $20,000,000, but he has added more than one-half of the increase that he makes upon all those incomes upon incomes of less than $30,000.

Mr. President, when the Senator was dealing with these low incomes, these incomes below $30,000, he went by very close steps; he only skipped a thousand dollars at a time, and he added another per cent for each thousand; but when he got above $30,000, when the income began to get a little bigger, he began to make his steps a little bit higher, a little bit wider, a little bit longer.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the Senator from Idaho will not divert me.

Mr. BORAH. I was going to ask if the Senator makes that objection to the amendment would he be willing to add an increase himself?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. After the amount of income gets above $30.000.

Mr. SIMMONS. What increase?

Mr. BORAH. After the income gets above $30,000, would you prefer an increased rate?

Mr. SIMMONS. I prefer the increases reported by the committee and I agree to the increases made by the Senate yesterday. I think they are just and equitable and have been worked out fairly.

Mr. BORAH. The objection which the Senator makes to this amendment is that the increase of the rate after the income reaches $30,000 is not sufficient?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; that is not the objection I am making to it. The objection I am making to it now, and the sole point I am making now is, that by the scheme which the Senator has devised it places the burden of this tax more heavily upon low incomes than it does upon the high incomes. That is the point I am making.

Mr. BORAH. It is precisely——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from North Carolina to decline to yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I did not decline to yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the Chair misunderstood the Senator and begs the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from North Carolina, then, in order to remedy that situation, would certainly favor increasing the per cent on incomes after they reach $30,000?

Mr. SIMMONS. I might do that; but, if the Senator from Idaho will pardon me, I would rather not be diverted from the matter which I am now discussing. When I get through with that I will take up the question which he suggests.

Mr. BORAH. Very well.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, when the Senator gets to the $30.000 income let us see how he deals with that. Then, instead of jumping a thousand dollars at a time, he proceeds to jump $2,500 at a time and makes just the same increase—1 per cent every time he jumps. He continues to make that jump of $2,500, adding 1 per cent for every $2,500 on these higher incomes in place of 1 per cent on $1,000, as on the lower incomes, until he reaches $50,000. When he reaches $50,000, Mr. President—and $50.000 is not a very big income—the Senator deals much more leniently with incomes ranging between $30,000 and $50,000 than he does with incomes ranging between $5,000 and $30,000; when he gets to $50,000—not a very big income, I repeat—the rate which he fixes is 33 per cent; in other words, Mr. President, in a total increase of 45 per cent in these surtaxes the Senator from Wisconsin, in the name of the common people, but I think in the interest of the rich, at least in the interest of making this an unpopular measure—in a total increase of 45 per cent the Senator puts 33 per cent of that on incomes below $50,000. All except 12 per cent, just three-fourths of the total increase under the amendment of the Senator, is upon incomes less than $50,000, and the other fourth is upon incomes running from $50,000 to $10,000,000 or more. It is said we want to fix it so that a man will pay according to his ability to pay; yet the Senator, the great tribune of the people in this body, would take 33 per cent out of the incomes of $50,000, from which there is perhaps not so much to spare, and would only take 45 per cent out of the incomes of the Rockefellers and the Goulds and the Vanderbilts.

Well, having reached that stage, the Senator gets a little more severe upon the man of small income and a little more kind to the man of larger income. He now changes his step again, and starting there he jumps $10,000 at a time; in other words, the tax on a $10,000 income that lies in between $50,000 and $60,000 is increased 1 per cent, but if that $10,000 income lies at the bottom of the schedule it is increased 10 per cent. Then the Senator goes on until he reaches incomes of $80,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. Leaping——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If you do, then that is what I wanted to ascertain—whether you would yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator should have addressed me in a more courteous tone of voice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators must address the Chair.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I did address the Chair. I simply wanted to know whether the Senator was willing to receive a correction.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. He said that the increase from $50,000 to the next bracket above was 1 per cent, and that the increase below that was 10 per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. No.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The increases below are 1 per cent for each bracket and the increase——

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not say that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is exactly what you said.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is exactly what I did not say.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is exactly what you did say, for I took it down as you said it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will let it stand at that, then.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is the reason why I thought you would want it corrected, because it is not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. SIMMONS. If I said that, I did not mean that; and I do not think I did say that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is what you said, and I thought you would desire to have it corrected.

Mr. SIMMONS. What I did say was this——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The increase in the next bracket is 2 per cent instead of 1 per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. The increase is from 33 to 34, from 34 to 35, from 35 to 36; that is the way it is written in the copy I have.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Very well; I will take care of that matter when I come to follow the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was absolutely right; I repeat it; that the $10,000 income that lies between $50,000 and $60,000 under the Senator's amendment gets an increase of 1 per cent, but if that $10,000 lies at the base of the bill, beginning with the $5,000 income, that same $10,000 would get 10 per cent increase under the Senator's amendment. He goes on at that rate of increase, Mr. President, jumping $10,000 at a time, and only adding 1 per cent. In the beginning he jumped $1,000, and when he was dealing with low incomes he added 1 per cent every time, and then when he gets to $30,000 he jumps $2,500 and adds only 1 per cent; and then when he gets to $50,000 he leaps $10,000 at a time and adds only 1 per cent.

He then leaps $20,000—from $60,000 to $80,000. The incomes that pass $60,000 can go on and on until they reach $80,000 and only get an increase of 1 per cent; but if it was at the bottom of this bill, that same $20,000 would get an increase of 20 per cent.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. I notice that the bill as reported by the committee makes a few leaps in a good many multiples of $10,000. How does the Senator defend that?

Mr. SIMMONS. It does make leaps, and leaps are right when they are made fairly and equitably; but when those leaps are made in the interest of the big income and against the interest of the little income they are not fair. When the leap on a $1,000 increase, on an income from $5,000 to $6,000, is charged 1 per cent and the leap from $60,000 to $80,000 is charged only 1 per cent, or one-twentieth as much on each $1,000 as is charged to the man of low income, I leave it to the conscience and common sense of this body to say whether that is just to the poorer man.

Now, Mr. President, we have finally reached incomes of $100,000. Under this amendment there seems to be something very sacred about a hundred thousand dollar income, because as soon as the Senator leaves a hundred thousand dollars—he reached 36 per cent when he got to a hundred thousand dollars—he is within 9 per cent of his maximum; he is within 9 per cent of the increase he is going to apply to the great fortunes of the rich. When he has reached a hundred thousand dollars he puts a surtax on that $100,000 of 36 per cent. The next leap is $50,000, I believe. He jumps from $100,000 to $150,000, and only adds 1 per cent. How lightly that $50,000 gets off compared with the $5,000 and $10,000 income.

He is now at 37 per cent on an income of $150,000. Then he goes on from $150,000 to $200,000, and then he goes on another $50,000 to $250,000. Then he goes on another $50,000 to $300,000. So that between $100,000 and $300,000 he has increased his rate 1, 2, 3—just exactly 4 per cent. The first $100,000 increase carries with it a surtax under the Senator's substitute of 36 per cent. The next $100,000 increase—now, we are getting to the fortunes of the very wealthy class—the next $100,000 increase only carries an additional increase of 2 per cent.

Now, finally, we get to $300,000, and then there is a jump to $500,000, a leap of $200,000, and only 1 per cent is added. Then there is a jump from $500,000 to a million dollars, and only another 1 per cent is added. Then there is a jump from a million dollars to $1,500,000, and only another 1 per cent is added. Then there is a jump from $1,500,000 to $2,000,000, and only another 1 per cent is added.

On the first $100,000 the rate is 36 per cent. That vast chasm between $100,000 and $2,000,000—a chasm so broad that the mind of man can hardly comprehend it—only bears an increase, Mr. President, in all of 8 per cent more than the $100,000 income. Incomes lying between $100,000 and the maximum income taxable under the amendment only are subject to 9 per cent additional; and yet, Mr. President, when you start with the beginning of the Senator's amendment the increase that he makes on the first $9,000, after deducting the $5,000 that is exempt, is 9 per cent. So that the per cent of the surtax is the same upon that $9,000 income as the per cent which represents the increase from $100,000 to incomes of over $2,000,000.

Mr. President, that is held up here to this body as an amendment to lift the burdens of this income tax off the shoulders of the poor man and off the shoulders of the man of moderate income and to put it upon the man of large income.

The Senator from Wisconsin is an adroit logician; he is an analyst of great power; but I defy his brilliant intellect, I defy his trained mind to demonstrate that his amendment does lift the burden off the poor man and put it on the rich. I assert—and I think my analysis of this amendment confirms and demonstrates the truth of my proposition—that his amendment is an ingenious scheme—I do not mean to say intentionally so, but it nevertheless is an ingenious scheme, Mr. President, of lifting the burden of this income tax off the big fortunes and placing it, in larger proportion, upon the small fortunes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for just a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to ask the Senator if he has made any estimate as to how much money will be raised in the whole country on incomes of $100,000 or less, and how much altogether will be raised on incomes of $100,000 and over up to the limit under the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I have not.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator from North Carolina claims that the burden is shifted to the lesser incomes, and I wanted to know what total would be raised on incomes of $100,000 and less and what amount would be raised on incomes of $100,000 and more.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not made those calculations. The Senator from Wisconsin did not present his amendment until late yesterday evening.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the same question would be interesting with reference to the committee bill as to how much would be raised on incomes below $100,000 and how much on incomes above.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to add that to the question I asked the Senator and request him to furnish information on that subject.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, in conclusion let me say that your committee was asked to raise revenue to meet the estimated expenditures, which at the time of its original report amounted to something over about five billions of dollars. I am not now prepared to say the exact amount. Your committee has in this bill, together with the other revenue legislation, provided for raising that amount of money. Under existing law, taxes have been levied estimated to raise $1,357,000,000. It is estimated that this bill as it was presented to the Senate will raise something over two billions of dollars, making $3,366,000,000. There has been authorized to be sold, specifically to meet war expenses, two billions of bonds, and about three hundred and ninety millions in addition to that.

When the Secretary of the Treasury sent his estimate to us before we framed the bill, his estimate was that the House bill, which raised one billion nine hundred and forty-odd millions of dollars, would not raise enough to meet the estimated expenditures of that time. As I have shown by the figures I have just given, we presented a bill that not only raises the additional amount that the Secretary said was necessary but raises some forty-odd millions of dollars, probably sixty-odd millions, in addition to that amount. In other words, Mr. President, we have provided for these estimates. We have not provided for certain estimates that have only recently been presented, but for which no appropriations have yet been made. When the Secretary sent those estimates up to our committee, we considered them and said: "No appropriations have been made for these estimates, and it would be probably an unprecedented thing to levy taxes upon the people to pay an indebtedness that the people have not yet approved and for which Congress has not yet appropriated." When that statement was made to the Secretary, he made no further insistence.

Mr. President, we have therefore provided for the payment of every dollar that has been appropriated by the Congress, and we have provided that of these five billions six hundred and ninety-three millions of dollars which the people are to pay this year three billions three hundred and sixty-six millions shall be paid by taxation. I undertake to say that the history of all the nations at war to-day will not show as great a percentage of annual expenditure raised by taxation. I undertake to say that the history of this country will not show any such percentage, and I undertake to say that the common sense of mankind will approve this distribution as a very liberal part for the present generation to pay—more, in my judgment, than it ought to pay. I think we should pay one-half of the expense of this war by taxation, and pay another small part of it by small serial bonds, to be spread out for 8 or 10 years, so that it will be a debt to be paid by this generation, but so as to give the people of this country 10 years in which to pay it instead of making them pay it all in one year, and let the balance, which I think ought to be at least one-third, be provided for by bonds to be paid by our posterity.

Mr. President, the blessings that are to come to this country from success in this war, the woe that is to come if we fail, will be known of our descendants. History will tell the story, and they will be worthy descendants of the people of this day. They will not hesitate, Mr. President. They will not regard it as a wrong done them by their ancestors when they are called upon to contribute their mite to the glory and to the perpetuity of their country and its institutions.

Mr. President, in the life of a man 50 years is a long time, but in the life of a nation it is but a brief span. The men who are to come after us, and to pay these bonds which we do not provide shall be paid by this generation, will reap a benefit as great as we will reap, without any of the other burdens, discomforts, and calamities to which, in these troubled times, we are subjected.

The plea, Mr. President, is a specious plea. It never has been made in this country before with the persistence and the vehemence with which it is being made to-day; and why, Mr. President? Because there was not the motive to make it that there is to-day.

Oh, Mr. President, tell me who the people are who are making this demand that we shall place the burden of all these expenses upon the people of this day and this year. Some of them are in favor of this war, but a great many of them have no sympathy with it. A great many of them have no sympathy with our taxation schemes, Mr. President, because they do not sympathize with the cause. There are men in this country to-day who are trying in every way in their power to make this war a failure, who are trying in every way in their power to embarrass this administration. I hope to God that that sentiment and that purpose and that motive will not find a lodgment in the hearts and minds of the United States Senate and control this great representative body of the people.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has sought to discredit those who have, as he says, been demanding that we pay all the expenses of this war by taxation. In order to disparage those who favor paying for the war as we go he strongly intimates, if he does not distinctly assert, that they belong to a class who are opposed to the war in which we are engaged, who desire to make the war as unpopular as possible.

Mr. President, I know of no body of men in this country who favor paying all the expenses of this war by taxation, excepting about 350 of the greatest economists in America, connected with the leading universities and colleges of the country. They believe that it would insure sound government finance for and promote justice as between classes, both now and in the generation to follow ours, if we should pay for this war as we go by taxation. I am advised of this by the fact that I found in the files of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives a petition in which they have joined, urging Congress to provide by taxation for paying the expenses of the war as we proceed.

Mr. President, in the minority report filed with the Senate a part of that petition is quoted. It was in the files of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, and has been printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which was the only reason for not publishing it in its entirety in the minority report. It is a very strongly reasoned petition from men who have devoted their lives to the study of economics and of government finance; and it is entitled to the respectful consideration of the United States Senate without there being lodged against the signers by any Senator an impeachment of the loyalty of these university professors to this Government.

Personally, I happen to know some of the signers of that great petition. Out of the 350 professors of political economy who signed that remarkable memorial I know of but one, sir, who was opposed to a declaration of war against Germany; and yet the chairman of the Committee on Finance proceeds to put under suspicion as to his loyalty every one of these university professors who is devoting himself strictly to the ideals and principles of the science which he has made his life work. Indeed, this is the lot of everyone who does not accept the majority report, which was so discredited in this body yesterday that it may, in part, account for the extraordinarily bitter speech to which we have listened here to-day. It is a common practice with some lawyers to seek at the outset—by casting suspicion upon the motives of the opposition—to destroy the soundness of the arguments and the value of the testimony presented by that side.

Mr. President, I might retaliate. I might say that loyalty to this Government is not devotion to the owners of big incomes and the producers of immense war profits. Devotion to this war against Germany, I say to the Senate, is not the making of a revenue bill that will place the burden of paying for the war upon the wage-earners and allow the rich and powerful to escape paying their just share of that cost.

The Senator from North Carolina, so tender of the incomes of gentlemen in this country who get $30,000 a year without drawing upon their principal, might have saved some of his sentiment for those from whom will be exacted $86,000,000 by his tax on tea, coffee, and sugar. To relieve great wealth, he, with others acting with him, imposed that tax upon these necessaries of life used by all the people of this country. He might have reserved some of his sympathy expressed so strongly for those with incomes that ranged from $20,000 to $100,000 for the people who, under the provisions of the bill that he and the group of the Finance Committee who acted with him reported to the Senate, are to pay $70,000,000 in higher transportation charges by reason of the imposition of a tax upon freight rates.

He might have reserved a bit of his tenderness of feeling for the people who are to pay $50,000,000 additional to put 3-cent stamps on their letters instead of 2-cent stamps. So on through the list of consumption taxes amounting to $406,350,000, imposed upon people already burdened with excessive war taxes in the form of war prices for the necessaries of life. And why is this unjust tax imposed upon the poorly paid and poorly fed, as the great mass of the people are at this time? Are they so well able to pay this tax of over $406,000,000 as the owners of surplus incomes and fat war profits? It is pretty late for gentlemen who agreed to that report to come before the Senate and the country and pose as the defenders of people of small and moderate incomes. It will be difficult for them to establish or maintain themselves as the friends of the poor and the people of moderate means when they favor taxing swollen fortunes at the lowest possible amount and force through these consumption taxes. I will read a few of the figures:

Seventy-seven million five hundred thousand dollars on freight rates.

Thirty-seven million five hundred thousand dollars on passenger rates.

Seven million dollars on telephone and telegraph messages.

Two million dollars voted by the Senate into this bill increases the parcel post in order to protect the express companies of the country.

I am glad to know that the Senate will have another opportunity, under the notice served by the distinguished junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], to vote again upon that amendment when the bill reaches the Senate. Before it reaches that stage I shall tender to the Senate for its consideration a substitute bill cutting out all these taxes to which I am now calling attention and increasing fairly and justly, as it seems to me, the taxes upon incomes and war profits by such an amount as will render it unnecessary to levy these consumption taxes, imposed upon the great mass of the people, and which are so ardently defended by the Senator from North Carolina.

Eighty-six million dollars on tea, coffee, cocoa, and sugar.

The total of all these taxes which will be paid directy by the people will amount to $406,350,000.

Now, Mr. President, I come to take up the amendment, which has been subjected to the severe denunciation of the Senator from North Carolina, who is the sponsor for this bill, that proposes to levy such a meager tax upon war profits as has already condemned the bill before the country and I think before the Senate. The Senator, who stands for raising the meager sum on incomes as a whole provided in the bill under the criticism of the people of the country who have made any study of it, admits its inadequacy. As evidenced by the vote taken in the Senate yesterday, the bill was rejected in the form in which it was presented to the Senate.

Now, Mr. President, I want to take up this amendment which I have proposed, and if Senators will give me their attention I am confident they will be convinced of the reasonableness of these rates. Mr. President, this amendment is not by any means a perfect assessment of taxes upon incomes. I made the rates as high upon the high incomes as I dared to and offered it with the hope that the Senate would adopt it. It does not, in my judgment, tax the large incomes at as high a rate as they should bear.

Now, let us see what it really does, for I am prepared to tell you exactly how much money a man with a given income under the amendment which I have offered will have to pay and what per cent it is of his income.

A man with a $3,000 income will have to pay $20 under the amendment as I have proposed it, and I shall ask leave now to print this table in connection with the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

The amount of tax a married person would pay at each bracket upon a given income under the proposed amendment, showing the rate per cent upon each income compared with the British rate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. A man who has a taxable income of $3,000 will pay $20 tax, which amounts to two-thirds of 1 per cent upon his taxable income. Under the British law such an income would pay 12½ per cent.

Upon a $5,000 income he will pay 1.6 per cent, or $80. Does that seem to Senators here like an unreasonable income tax to pay upon an income of that amount?

Upon an income of $6,000 he will pay the sum of $130 to help support this war. That is, the total tax that he will pay amounts to 2.17 per cent, as against an English rate of 15 on earned and 20 per cent on unearned incomes of like amount.

Mr. TOWNSEND. To make it clear, may I ask the Senator if this is the additional tax that he will pay?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; it is the total tax that he will pay.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I ask the Senator a question in order to make his proposition thoroughly understood? The Senator's amendment takes the place of other taxes levied in the majority bill?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Proposed to be levied by the majority bill.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It takes the place of the taxes in the brackets?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, sir. It is contemplated that if we shall add sufficiently to the war-profits tax and to the individual income taxes when we come to consider that question in this connection, with this we will be able to eliminate all consumption taxes.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That is the point I wanted the Senator to make.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then we could strike from the bill all taxes included in the bill from Title V to Title IX, inclusive, and Title XI.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It takes the place of the taxes on the necessaries of life and on freight rates——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. All those taxes that have been under discussion here.

Mr. VARDAMAN. On parcel-post packages and all?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. BROUSSARD. The Senator speaks of a tax on an income of $3,000. I understand that incomes of $3,000 are exempt from the tax.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Under the old law, but not by the bill as reported by the majority, and so I have followed the majority with regard to taxing those incomes.

Mr. BROUSSARD. A further question. What amount of money is exempt from taxation under the bill of the majority?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Incomes of $1,000 or below for unmarried men, and incomes of $2,000 or below for married men.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Does the $3,000 income referred to in the first statement made by the Senator mean $3,000 above the exemption fixed?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If I understand the Senator.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I am not clear in my mind as to that. As I understand the bill of the majority, there is an exemption of $1,000 for single men and $2,000 for married men. Is the $3,000 upon which the Senator calculates the tax the amount of money in excess of the exemption or does it include the tax upon the entire amount?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; it is just the amount over and above the $2,000 that pays that percentage.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let me ask the Senator a question, as I am not very sure about the tax proposed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator will just let me add one sentence, let me say that upon incomes up to $5,000 the amendment as I have proposed it carries exactly the same rate per cent as the committee amendment. I have made no increase until I reach incomes of $5,000 and over. Now I will be glad to yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The committee bill does not impose a tax on incomes of $3,000 of $200 or $150, as I understand it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, no.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As I understand it, it is only 2 per cent for a married man on the $1,000 between the $2,000 and the $3,000, which would really be only $20.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And this new tax of 2 per cent starts at $2,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. For married people.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; that is what I mean. It would then be only $40 for the $2,000 between $2,000 and $4,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The amendment which I propose makes no changes in the committee report up to $5,000. I would like to get that straight.

Mr. HOLLIS. I think the Senator is in error there. There is no change until it reaches $6,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Above $5,000 and up to $6,000.

Mr. HOLLIS. No; above $6,000. At $6,000 the majority plan taxes 5 per cent, and so does the Senator under his plan. From $6,000 up the Senator would increase it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is true. I did misstate myself there. My tables show that at above $5,000 and not exceeding $6,000 the rate is the same as the total rate of the committee. Above $6,000 and not exceeding $7,000, my rate is 6 per cent and their rate is 5 per cent. There is where the line of departure occurs. I had made the division here wrong.

If Senators will be so kind as to follow me I should like it, because a statement of the amounts paid in the proposed amendment and the rate at which they are paid is a complete answer to the argument made here by the Senator from North Carolina that this proposed amendment is unjust.

On an income of $7,000 the amount paid is $190 and the rate is 2.71 per cent.

On a taxable income of $8,000 under the amendment the amount paid is $260 and the equivalent rate is 3.25 per cent.

On $9,000 the tax paid is $340 and the rate is 3.78 per cent.

On $10,000 the tax paid is $430 and the rate is 4.3 per cent.

On $11,000 the tax paid is $530 and the rate is 4.82 per cent.

On $12,000 the total tax paid is $640 and the rate is 5.33 per cent.

On $13,000 the amount paid is $760 and the rate is 5.85 per cent.

On $14,000 the total tax paid is $890 and the rate is 6.36 per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. May I ask the Senator a question there, so as to understand his figures a little better? Does that mean that the total income is $14,000, or that the income in excess of the exemption is $14,000?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It means where the total income is $14,000.

On $15,000, under my amendment, he would pay $1,030, or 6.87 per cent.

On $16,000 he would pay $1,180, or 7.37 per cent.

On $17,000 he would pay $1,340, or 7.88 per cent.

While a little later I shall state the British income tax, I pause just here to say that I should like Senators to know that where our normal rate is 2 per cent the British normal is 25 per cent, attaching to all incomes over $12,500, and then they add a supertax on top of that. Now I am talking about an income of $17,000, which pays $1,340, or 7.88 per cent, including the normal of the existing law and the war normal and the war surtax. The British income normal upon that amount would be 25 per cent, and with the supertax the British rate on an income of $17,000 is 30⅝ per cent. Yet the chairman of the Finance Committee shouts his denunciation of a proposed amendment that would levy a tax upon a $17,000 income of 7.88 per cent, when Great Britain's normal tax alone is 25 per cent on that amount, to say nothing of the supertax imposed in addition to the normal tax.

Mr. OWEN. What is the supertax?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will have to refer to the table to give that. I will again, referring to the British rates in order that Senators may understand just what they are doing, after I have gone through this normal tax. It is a normal tax of 25 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is right here. I read from a little work by a member of the British Parliament. I am diverted to do it because the Senator from Utah interrupts me:

> Unearned incomes of upward of $10,000 pay 25 per cent on the whole income. Unearned incomes of more than $12,500 pay similarly.

Now, that is what we call our normal 2 per cent. Great Britain's normal and constant tax that runs through all these schedules is 25 per cent, and discussing the supertax imposed this author says:

> Supertax applies to all incomes in excess of $15,000, is an additional duty, irrespective of ordinary income tax.
> What we call the normal tax they call the ordinary tax.
> It is levied upon amounts in excess of a fixed sum of £12,500; and the tax is graduated from a minmum of 4½ per cent of the first $2,500 of the excess over $12,500 to a maximum of 17½ per cent, payable on that portion of the income exceeding $50,000.

Which is added to the 25 per cent ordinary or normal tax, bringing it up to 42½ per cent.

Now, Senators, go with me step by step through the taxes which this amendment proposes upon incomes. I have given you what you would pay upon incomes of $17,000, upon incomes of $18,000, mind you, over and above your exemption, which for this war tax is $2,000 if you are married. Upon incomes of $18,000 over and above the exemption you would pay $1,510 or 8.39 per cent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, there seems to be a misunderstanding among Senators as to just what that covers. I understand that is all the tax a man would have to pay under existing law.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. All the tax he would pay under existing law and under the proposed amendment as reported by the committee and as proposed to be amended by myself.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wanted to get that clear. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. This would tax only the incomes of individuals. I want it understood that the total amount of income tax that is to be paid, if this amendment which I propose is adopted, includes what is to be paid under existing law and what will be paid under the new law, if my amendment is adopted. I thank the Senator for the interruption, because I can not afford to have any misunderstand. This is a matter that is going to be subject to review.

Upon incomes of $19,000 $1,690 is to be paid, or 8.89 per cent tax. Does that seem to any Senator here like an unreasonable tax upon an income of $19,000? Mark you, that is the income with your exemption of $4,000 under the existing law and of $2,000 under this proposed tax deducted. That would mean for every married man with an income of $19,000 he would pay under my amendment only a 8.89 per cent tax. Under the British law he would pay 30⅝ per cent.

Upon an income of $20,000 he would pay $1,890 of it to the Government in this great emergency, which would be 9.45 per cent only.

Upon an income of $21,000 there would be paid a total tax of $2,100, or 10 per cent.

Upon an income of $22,000 there would be paid $2,320, or 10.54 per cent income tax.

Upon an income of $23,000 you would pay as the measure of your patriotism $2,550, or 11.09 per cent.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator what, under the majority report, would be the tax on $25,000 compared with the Senator's amendment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am not sure that I can give that. As they furnish it in their table they give it for $20,000 and not $25,000. You would have to figure it. Under the several rates you pay a different rate on every bracket on your income. It is a combination of several rates. If your income is $20,000, you do not pay the amount that happens to be set opposite $20,000 bracket in the bill.

You pay at each step a lower rate as you ascend to $20,000, according to the brackets in the bill. They have not figured it out for $25,000, but they have figured it out for $20,000, and I am able to make the comparison.

Mr. OVERMAN. Take the per cent on $20,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will give that to you in just a second.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is 12.30 per cent on $20,000 and 25.30 per cent on $30,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will in just a moment give precisely what the rate is. They do not give in their table how much will be paid, but they give the total per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They give the total amount also on page 23. It shows that on an income of $20,000 the tax is $1,230 and on an income of $30,000 the tax is $2,530.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, sir. Now I will give it to you and give you the per cent. I will go back to $20,000, under the amendment which is before the Senate. Under my amendment a $20,000 income, over and above the exemption, will pay $1,890, or 9.45 per cent; under the proposed committee amendment it will pay $1,230, or 6.1 per cent. That is the difference. If your income is $20,000, if you vote for the majority plan you will only have to pay an income tax which is equivalent to 6.1 per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That would be upon the total income if it were calculated without regard to any exemption whatever?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; I think that is understood by everybody now. If you vote with the chairman of the committee for the majority plan, instead of for my amendment, and you have a $20,000 income, you will get off with 6.1 per cent; you will only have to pay $1,230; but if you should vote for my amendment, you will have to be a little bit more patriotic; you will have to pay 9.45 per cent, or $1,890.

Mr. President, I had gotten down, I think, if anybody has followed me and can tell me——

Mr. OVERMAN. To incomes of $25,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. To incomes of $23,000. I now come to taxable incomes of $24,000. Upon an income of $24,000 you would have to pay under the amendment which I have offered $2,790, or 11.62 per cent.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the Senator please answer me a question? What is the exemption under the English law? The Senator has stated, I think, that the English rate is 25 per cent on all incomes over $15,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The exemption, or abatement, as it is termed, under the English law varies with the size of the income and is not allowed on incomes in excess of $35,000. Incomes under $650 are not taxed in England.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is, all above $650 must bear an income tax?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; but it does not have to bear what they call the ordinary tax and what we call the normal tax of 25 per cent until it reaches for unearned incomes $10,000 and for earned incomes $12,500. At that point the normal tax of 25 per cent attaches; below that they have a graduated tax, which is heavier than I should like to see imposed upon small incomes in this country.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion there with reference to the tax upon the small incomes in England, to which reference was made on yesterday? They have there the distinction between earned and unearned incomes——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Which makes a vast difference in the situation. We have not yet that distinction in this country, though we shall have to come to it at some time. If we had the distinction between unearned and earned incomes, we could afford to go much lower in taxing the incomes than we do at this time; that is, make the exemption much smaller.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, perhaps it will save time for me to read a statement from Mr. Urban H. Broughton, a member of Parliament, on the English income tax. This is a recent publication—1916:

> Income tax is now levied upon all incomes exceeding $650, but certain special abatements are granted in respect to all persons whose total incomes do not exceed $3,500. The rate upon unearned incomes is higher than that upon earned incomes—

Earned incomes are derived from a man's efforts, unearned incomes are derived from accumulations, from reserve capital, from investments, and all that sort of thing—> but when the income is greater than $12,520 this distinction disappears.

> The rate upon incomes (less abatements) from $650 to $10,000 is graduated from a minimum of 11¼ per cent of the income remaining after deduction of the abatements referred to, up to a maximum of 22½ per cent payable on the total income; and the rate varies accordingly as the income is earned or unearned. Unearned incomes of upward of $10,000 pay 25 per cent on the whole income; earned incomes of more than $12,500 pay similarly.
> Supertax applies to all incomes in excess of $15,000 as an additional duty, irrespective of ordinary income tax.

That is the normal tax, as we call it here—

> It is levied upon amounts in excess of a fixed sum of $12,500; and the tax is graduated from a minimum of 4½ per cent of the first $2,500 of the excess over $12,500 to a maximum of 17½ per cent payable on that portion of the income exceeding $50,000.

Then, after the income gets to $50,000, the rate is 17½ per cent added to the 25 per cent normal or ordinary, which makes 42½ per cent tax on incomes from that on. They do not have any tenderness of feeling; they have not that highly commendable consideration for the distinction between incomes of $50,000 and above that the chairman of the Committee on Finance manifested to such moving degree this morning. They tax all incomes above $50,000 a flat 42½ per cent. They do not raise that rate as incomes mount up into the millions, though I think they should, and I shall be very glad to raise the rate on such incomes higher than anything which is suggested by the majority. The only reason why I fixed the rates in this amendment as I have done is because, in the first place, if you want an income tax to be effective you have got to gather the greater portion of it upon incomes ranging from twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, sixty, seventy, eighty, one hundred, one hundred and fifty, two hundred, two hundred and fifty, three hundred, and four hundred thousand dollars. It is right in there that the great mass of the incomes of the country—the large number of incomes—are to be found from which we can derive a considerable revenue. It is a mockery, Mr. President, to present a bill that puts very high income taxes only upon the incomes which reach a million dollars and two million dollars and more; there are only 120 incomes in this country above a million dollars.

It will sound well; it will go to the country as a big tax on Rockefeller; but all of that great body of rich, that great body of incomes ranging from $50,000 to $500,000 are not affected by a 50 or 60 or 70 per cent rate on incomes of a million dollars or more.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GERRY in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I suggest to the Senator that I think it would improve his amendment if he would so frame it as to increase the tax on great fortunes?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should be most happy to do so if I could get support on this floor for reaching down into the pockets of those who receive big incomes. This amendment does not represent my ideal of an income tax, but it represents all I hope to get out of the United States Senate.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I hope the Senator will offer an amendment in harmony with the views he has expressed. I should like to vote for it, and I think every other Senator would do so; certainly the chairman of the committee would vote for it, as he criticized the present basis on which the Senator's amendment is framed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But the Senator must understand that one who presents an amendment of this kind labors under the embarrassment that when he offers the amendment he is called upon to make an estimate as to what the amendment will produce in revenue, and if he can not do that he is more or less at sea. Conservative Senators scratch their heads and say: "Well, we do not know just what revenue this will produce as a whole." Then when the amendment is presented if the Senator offering it begins to vary it, all calculations and tables which he has made upon it as it was prepared, the result of days and nights of labor, are no longer strictly applicable and must be modified to meet the changes in the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, while it is no part of the explanation which I started out to make of the table, I am going to ask to insert in this connection and as an appendix to my remarks the figures as to personal income, the number of returns, and so forth, as found in the Statistical Abstract for 1915, and also for 1916, if that has been issued.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Now I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think that covers what I was going to ask. I notice that the chairman of the committee seems to think that the adoption of this amendment would cause widespread dissatisfaction among the 100,000,000 people in this country, and I was just going to ask the Senator if he knows how many people, according to the last report, would be affected by this income tax? My recollection is that I have seen somewhere that the income tax affects a little over 300,000 people out of over 100,000,000 of people of the country.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thank the Senator. The Senator from North Carolina said that this amendment was manifestly offered and that this movement to raise a large amount by taxation on incomes was backed by those who want to make this war unpopular with the people, and that my amendment will have the effect of spreading, like a prairie fire, discontent among the great masses of the people of this country because of the increases made in the tax on incomes as I have been reading them, and as they are covered by my amendment. A reference to the Statistical Abstract shows that there are about 350,000 people out of 104,000,000 people who are affected at all by this amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] gives me the figures for 1915 of those who paid income taxes, and the number was 336,672.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have the figures accurately, then—336,672 are to be aroused to hostility to the war. The Senator from North Carolina is much disturbed lest the war spirit of this country will be dampened and chilled by an increase in the taxes upon incomes affecting a little over 300,000 people, when I think it will rejoice, Mr. President, the 103,700,000 people to know that those who have incomes and are able to bear their share in the great struggle are called upon in the amendment which I have proposed to make some sort of a stagger toward doing their bit.

If either one of the propositions now before the Senate is calculated to arouse hostility to this war and sow widespread discontent among the people against a war unpopular to start with, augmenting its unpopularity, I ask you whether it is the majority report that takes such tender care of war profits and the taxes upon the incomes of the rich and places a burden of nearly a half billion dollars onto the great body of the people of this country already taxed by war prices from 50 to 100 per cent, or this proposition to make surplus incomes pay a just share of these war costs? I ask you, Mr. President, which proposition is most likely to be productive of disturbance and discontent and to spread dissatisfaction and render the war unpopular, that which is brought in here by the majority or that which comes here backed by not only the three Members of the minority who signed the report but, as evidenced yesterday, by another Member of the majority? I know, Mr. President, however they may go on record here in response to what is called committee loyalty, that deep down in the hearts of enough members of the Finance Committee to make a majority is the feeling that this bill is a monumental blunder.

Mr. President, when I was diverted, or when I myself digressed from the presentation of the table which elucidates and explains the amendment I have offered, I had read in the regular order of brackets in the table as applied to that amendment the figures as to taxable incomes of $24,000.

On a taxable income of $25,000 the total tax paid would be $3,040 and the rate per cent 12.16.

On a $26,000 taxable income under my proposed amendment the total amount paid in taxes would be $3,300 and the rate 12.69 per cent.

On a $27,000 taxable income the amount paid in taxes would be $3,570 and the actual rate would be 13.22 per cent.

A $28,000 taxable income would pay a total tax under my amendment of $3,850, or 13.75 per cent.

A $29,000 income under my proposed amendment would pay a total tax of $4,140, and would pay that tax based upon an actual rate of 14.28 per cent.

A $30,000 income would pay $4,440, or 14.80 per cent.

Let us see what the committee proposition would take out of a $30,000 income. Where my amendment would take $4,440, the bill as reported by the committee would let the man off with $2,530 and the rate per cent would be 8.43. The rate per cent under my amendment would be 14.80 and the rate per cent under the British law would be 25 per cent flat—more than the combined rates both of the majority bill and the amendment proposed by me, and added to that the surtax, making the total under the British law 35⅝ per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is not that English tax based upon an income from investment rather than from individual effort?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; after you reach $12,500 earned and unearned incomes take the same rate. I have just read into the RECORD a statement as to the English law.

On an income of $32,500 the amount paid under my amendment would be $5,215, and the rate is 16.05 per cent.

On an income of $35,000 the amount paid under the amendment I have offered would be $5,815, and the rate per cent 16.61.

Mr. President, I am going to ask to supply in the table from which I have been reading, and which I already have the consent of the Senate to print in another column, the per cent that would be paid on the same incomes under the British income tax.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The comparison would be very interesting.

Upon a taxable income of $37,500 the total tax paid under the amendment I have proposed would be $6,840, and the rate per cent would be 18.24.

I wonder if Senators would be interested in knowing what the British rate is? Where the rate which would be imposed by my amendment would be 18.24 per cent, the British rate on exactly the same income would be 37½ per cent—almost twice as much.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I think it would be well for the Senator to furnish that comparison all the way through.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will do so. I have just obtained the consent of the Senate to do that. I might have read them if I had found earlier this table of British incomes.

Mr. BRADY. I think that will be very beneficial information.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, sir; I will furnish it all the way through.

On an income of $40,000, under my proposed amendment, a total tax of $7,690 would be paid, and the actual rate on that income would be 19.22 per cent. I will now ask the Senator from Washington to state what the British rate would be? I have handed him a table which shows it. I will ask him just to follow me, and read from that table what the British rate would be on an income of $40,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The British rate would be 39⅛ per cent.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Thirty-nine and one-sixth per cent, as against 19.22 per cent in the amendment which I have proposed—just double.

An income of $42,500 would pay, under my amendment, an income tax to help prosecute this war of $8,590, at an actual taxable rate of 20.21 per cent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The British rate is 39⅛ per cent.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. An income of $45,000 under the amendment which I have proposed would pay a tax of $9,515, the actual rate being 21.14 per cent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The British rate is 40⅛ per cent.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. An income of $47,500 under the amendment which I have proposed would pay a total tax—including the tax of the existing law, of course—of $10,465, or 22.03 per cent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The British rate is 40⅛ per cent.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. An income of $50,000 would pay a total tax under the amendment which I have offered of $11,440, the total rate of taxation being 22.88 per cent. What is the total rate of a $50,000 income tax in Great Britain?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Forty-two and one-half per cent.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, from that time on the British rate does not increase. It remains, upon all incomes, at 42½ per cent. In the pending amendment the rates are increased, as will be observed as I proceed to present the table; and I will say that I should be very glad if the Senate would increase these rates upon the higher incomes. You can not get them too high for me unless you put them so high—and there is no danger of the United States Senate doing that—as to interfere with the efficiency and the production of our industrial and commercial enterprises. I should not like to see the rates placed at a point where that would result.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I might suggest here that the Senator has placed as a part of his amendment at the close, covering the very high incomes, the amount fixed by the Senate by a unanimous vote yesterday.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Exactly, Mr. President. I have gone as far as the Senate has given any indication of its willingness to go in the very high incomes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Very gladly.

Mr. KING. In making the investigations, limited as they are, that I have made respecting these matters, it seemed to me that the increases, if increases were to be had over the Senate bill, ought to be more largely upon income tax than upon the profit tax of corporations, for the reason that a large portion of the profit tax of corporations, after being taxed in the hands of the corporations, would be distributed as dividends, and, of course, would be taxed again, and a considerable portion of those dividends would reach the hands of small income holders. Therefore it seemed to me that it would be more advantageous to tax incomes than to tax corporation profits; that is, to increase the rates more largely upon incomes than upon corporation profits. Has the Senator considered that feature, and has he reached a similar conclusion or a different conclusion?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I will say that I have been rather forced to the conclusion that we should raise about double the amount from war profits that we raise from incomes, because a considerable portion of the amount which we raise from incomes is derived from fixed investments that are not affected at all by the war, while all that we raise from war profits is derived from sources that are created by the war itself, and we leave untaxed so far as the war-profits tax is concerned all of the normal profits. But I should prefer to defer a further discussion of that until we come to the war-profits tax.

Mr. President, proceeding with the statement of this amendment and the amount of tax derived from each bracket, I give now the next.

Upon an income of $60,000, the total tax paid would amount to $15,540, and the rate would be 25.90 per cent under the proposed amendment; while the rate per cent under the British income-tax law would be 42½. Mr. President, if you should adhere to the committee provision, instead of the proposed amendment, upon a taxable income of $60,000, instead of $15,540, you would pay $6,630. Instead of 25.90 per cent, you would pay 11.05 per cent.

Upon a taxable income of $80,000, under the amendment which I have proposed, added to the existing law, you would pay a total tax of $24,140, or at an actual rate of 30.17 per cent. Now, if that is not big enough to suit the distinguished Senator from North Carolina, I will accept, if he will offer it, an amendment increasing that amount, without any argument whatever. Indeed, I would be mighty glad to get the approval of the chairman of the Finance Committee for increasing all of these amounts from $30,000 up to any number of millions.

Upon an income of $100.000 there would be a total tax paid under my amendment of $33,140, the actual tax rate being 33.14 per cent. Where you would collect under my amendment $33,140 you would collect under the committee proposition, which I seek to amend, $15,630, and where the rate per cent would be under my amendment 33.14 the rate per cent under the committe report would be 15.63.

Upon an income of $150.000 there would be paid $56,140 under my amendment, at an actual tax rate of 37.76 per cent. Where a man with an income of $150,000 would pay $56,140 under my amendment he would pay under the committee provision $30,130. Where he would pay at the rate of 37.76 per cent under my amendment he would pay at the rate of 20.9 per cent under the committee amendment.

Upon an income of $200.000 under the amendment which I have proposed there would be paid a total tax of $81,140, or 40.57 per cent. Under the committee bill there would be paid $46,630, as against $81,140 under the amendment I have offered, at an actual tax rate of 23.30 per cent under the committee bill, as against the tax rate of 40.57 per cent under my proposed amendment.

An income of $250,000 would pay under the pending amendment $106.640, or 42.66 per cent, and under the majority bill $65,130, at an actual tax rate of 26.05 per cent.

An income of $300,000 would pay, under the amendment which I have proposed, a total tax of $133,140, which would be 44.38 per cent of the income. If that is not high enough to suit the Senator from North Carolina, let him rise and propose an amendment increasing it. I will accept it. Where under my amendment you would collect $133,140, under the bill, as reported by the chairman of the committee, you would collect $85,630. Where my rate per cent would be 44.38, the rate per cent of the majority of the committee would be 28.5.

Upon an income of $500,000, under the amendment which I have proposed there would be paid $243,140 at an actual tax rate of 48.63 per cent.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In just a minute.

Where the total tax under my amendment for that taxable income would be $243,140, under the committee amendment it would be $173,630, or 34.73 per cent, against the actual tax rate proposed under my amendment of 48.63 per cent.

I now yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I was just trying to follow the Senator. If I get his amendment right, he does not include in one bracket income from $500,000 to $1,000,000, but from $500,000 to $750,000, under the amendment which he proposed last evening.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It may be that in the press of making up this table one of those brackets was missed. I am not certain; but the Senator may not have the amendment which I proposed. I have three amendments upon the tables of Senators.

Mr. TOWNSEND. This is the one that the Senator proposed late last night.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand how that came about, Mr. President. I accepted yesterday afternoon, before I had given the order for this table, the amendments offered by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], which brought in that new bracket of $750,000; but it will not very materially change the result.

My attention has just been called by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] to the fact that according to the official report only 174 people in the United States pay taxes under the existing tax law upon taxable incomes of $500,000 or more.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. BRADY. At this point I want to call the Senator's attention to the number of persons who made returns in 1915, according to the Statistical Abstract of the United States for that year, to demonstrate that the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin is not going to create the great dissatisfaction in the country that the chairman of the committee seemed to think it might. While my figures may not be entirely accurate, since the matter has been under discussion just a few moments ago I have taken the figures from the records here before me.

According to the minority and majority reports of the committee, the tax rate does not change, or is entirely equal, up to $25,000. Is that correct, according to the committee reports here?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Does the Senator mean the committee bill?

Mr. BRADY. I refer to the Senator's amendment offered yesterday. What is the income tax on $25,000 according to the Senator's amendment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The actual tax would be $3,040.

Mr. BRADY. And what is the rate?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The rate per cent is 12.16 per cent.

Mr. BRADY. That is practically the same as the committee rate. Up to that amount, incomes of $25,000 and under, there were 335,830 taxpayers, so you do not affect the large majority of those who are paying taxes and making returns. Over $100.000 and up to $500,000 there are only 2,148, and from $500,000 up there are only 174. Taking all those above 13 per cent, where the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin commences to raise the income tax, it only affects 21,985 people, so it is very easy to see that there is not going to be any particular revolution on account of the additional income tax.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do, with pleasure.

Mr. GRONNA. I said a moment ago that I had been unable to secure a copy of the Statistical Abstract for 1916. It has been issued, however. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the number of people who would pay an income tax on incomes between $250.000 and $300,000 according to the last report is 216; the number that would pay on incomes of $300,000 to $400,000 is 254; the number who would pay on incomes from $400,000 to $500,000 is 122; and the number that would have to pay on incomes from $500,000 to $1,000,000 has increased from 174 in 1915 to 209 in 1916. So comparatively few persons would be affected by the income tax on these large incomes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am obliged to the Senator from North Dakota for giving me those facts; and now, Mr. President, I soon shall have completed this table.

An income of $1,000,000, under the amendment which I have proposed, would pay a total tax of $533,140. The actual rate would be 53.31 per cent. As against the $533.140 which would be collected under the amendment as I have proposed it, the bill as reported by the committee would collect $408,630 on a million-dollar income, or at an actual rate of 40.8 per cent, as against 53.31 per cent, the actual rate under the amendment as I have proposed it.

Upon an income of $1,500,000 the total amount of tax actually paid under the proposed amendment would be $863,140 by each person having an income of $1,500,000, or 57.54 per cent of the total income. A $2,000,000 income would pay, under the amendment as presented to the Senate, a total tax of $1,198,140, or 59.91 per cent.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, would it disturb the Senator to yield at this point?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I shall be very glad to yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that the chairman of the committee criticized very severely the pending amendment, because the Senator from Wisconsin proposed in his amendment steps ranging all the way from $100,000 to $250,000. I find in the majority report that they take steps from $1,000,000 to $10,000,000, and I want to call the Senator's attention to the number of people who would be affected in the entire United States under the maximum rate as proposed by the majority of the committee.

I understand that one man in the United States receives an income of more than $10,000,000—just one. One hundred and twenty-two people pay taxes on incomes of more than $1,000,000; but the entire number affected by the maximum rate proposed by the majority of the committee would be 552, according to the Statistical Abstract of 1916.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am obliged to the Senator.

Upon all incomes over $2,000,000 the tax proposed by the amendment which I have offered is at precisely the same rate as that adopted unanimously by the Senate yesterday, and it would tax all incomes of $2,000,000 at 59.91 per cent.

Mr. President, I had intended to take up the British income-tax law and analyze it somewhat, but I think in connection with the presentation of this table I have adverted to it sufficiently, so that Senators who have not found time to examine it critically will get the distinction between the British income-tax law and ours, the existing law as well as the proposed income-tax law. I might say that if there are any Senators here who were not in when I did refer to it that, under the British law, whenever incomes reach the amount of $10,000, if they are unearned, or $12,500, if they are earned, the British law levies a tax of 25 per cent upon all those incomes, and upon all incomes of larger amounts whatever they may be from that on. Now, that is called in the British law the ordinary tax. It is similar to the normal tax of 2 per cent which we have in our old law. We make an addition of 2 per cent tax apply to all taxable incomes for war purposes, an additional normal. So we will have when this bill is law a normal and constant tax of 4 per cent.

Great Britain has a constant tax after you reach incomes of $12,500 of 25 per cent—what they call the ordinary tax—and to that are added surtaxes from 1 to 17½ per cent, graduated as the income increases, until at incomes of $50,000 there is a surtax of 17½ per cent added to the 25 per cent ordinary rate, and from that point on the English law carries an income tax of 42½ per cent on all incomes above $50,000.

I think we should tax at a higher rate as the incomes go up, and we have provided in the bill as reported from the committee for small increases in taxes for these higher incomes, and in the amendment which I have proposed I have followed that same plan, excepting that I have introduced more brackets than are to be found in the committee amendment, and apply a higher rate of war surtax upon all incomes up to $750,000.

Now, Mr. President, with just this summing up of what would be collected in revenue under the proposed amendment I shall yield the floor, at least for the present.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] makes a suggestion to me which I am grateful to him for making. It is that the attention of the Senate be directed to the fact; that is, with reference to the total amount of revenue which will be collected under my proposed amendment.

Under the amendment which I have proposed on taxable incomes not in excess of $10,000 there would be collected $80,123,890.

On taxable incomes upon incomes not in excess of $20,000 there would be collected $161,358,022. That is the total of all incomes to $20,000, and it equals 18 per cent of the total income collected.

On taxable incomes not in excess of $30,000 there would be collected a total of $228,724,152, or incomes up to $30,000 would provide 26.91 per cent of the total revenue collected.

The taxable incomes not in excess of $50,000 under my amendment would bear a total of $313,352,362 or 36.87 per cent of the total estimated revenue.

From taxable incomes not in excess of $100,000 there would be collected a total revenue of $442,881,122, or 52.1 per cent of the total revenue.

The war revenue which would be collected under my amendment is estimated to amount to $712,941,442 and a total revenue of $850,142,772. Of this, incomes in excess of $30,000 would pay over 73 per cent.

Mr. GORE. At what rate?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I say incomes in excess of $30,000 at the rates proposed in my amendment will pay 73 per cent of the total tax that would be collected under the amendment.

Incomes in excess of $50,000 would pay over 63 per cent of the total tax.

Incomes in excess of $100,000 would pay over 48 per cent.

Mr. President, I submit this amendment to the just consideration of the Senate. Taking into consideration everything which we ought to weigh carefully and with the utmost scruple, taking into account the influence of our legislation upon public thought, having due regard for the people whose sons we are drafting into this war, I believe, Mr. President, that we shall fall far short of our duty if we do not make at least as great an increase in the income taxes to be collected as are covered by the amendment which I have proposed.

I appeal to Senators in the interest of promoting the great enterprise with which we are charged here now, with the highest responsibility that can rest upon men, to make this tax the greatest in the history of all legislation, a tax that shall be accepted by the millions of the people who have to bear the great burdens which this war imposes upon them. Lift the load from those who must furnish the great body of the soldiery that will be sent to slaughter and place it upon those who are able to bear it, the owners of surplus incomes and those making profits from war. I appeal to you to have consideration and regard for all that is involved in our work here and to pass such a tax bill, so far as incomes are concerned, as will meet with something like general approval of the country.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. KIRBY. I announce the absence of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] on official business.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to submit some observations upon this bill before we come to dispose of it finally, and I propose to do so at this time, although it is not my purpose to discuss in detail the particular amendment which is now pending.

Any phase of this war is of sufficient moment to engage our most serious consideration. When war is declared it is natural for the public mind to wander exclusively to the battle lines, to think of the place and of that feature of the war where men are fighting and dying. But that is not all there is to modern warfare. Perhaps one of the most difficult phases, the most stupendous task associated with modern warfare arises out of the situation with which we are now dealing, that of raising revenue with which to sustain the army and with which to maintain the Government; and in the particular situation in which we now find ourselves, not only our own Government but all the governments and peoples involved on the side of the allies. The burden of expense, though we are only at the beginning, seems vast beyond anything the people of this country ever contemplated. The public mind is bewildered; the ordinary citizen is restless. In meeting the crisis two things we must keep in view—we must be frank and we must be fair. We must tell the people what it is costing and where the money is going, and we must show them that we propose to place the burden where in good conscience and equity it ought to rest.

What is the financial task before us—the tax situation? We have not only our own Government's legitimate and necessary expenses to meet, great enough indeed, but we have with much haste and marvelous freedom upon the part of the Government assumed to underwrite all the entente nations of the earth. Every imperiled nation arrayed against Germany and every needy nation of Europe unfriendly to Germany have been told, ask and ye shall receive, knock and the door of the Treasury shall be opened unto you. I do not stop now to discuss the necessity or exigency or wisdom of such a policy. My views were early expressed and have in no sense been modified. But the policy has become the policy of our Government. The money is being poured by the millions into the depleted treasuries of Europe. With a generosity never before known in the history of the world the broken and humbled dynasties of the Old World are being financed. We have given, and will continue to give, freely and generously to all who come, even to some who are not able to give us any assurance that they will remain a responsible government a fortnight after the money should be received. This is the easy part of the task, this is the glory. This is the pomp and circumstance of glorious war. Now, sir, comes the grind. Now, we take up the task of levying tribute upon industry, upon toil, even upon necessity, to meet the obligations so freely and so generously made. This part of the task means business worry, means countless hours of patient, grinding toil, means sacrifice, means children deprived of education, means families deprived of the necessaries of life. When we think of the deprivation, the hours and weeks and months and years of drudgery to meet these obligations, we realize that the suffering and the agony of the battle field are not the only suffering, the only agony of this horrible sacrifice now imposed upon us as if by fate.

But how shall we meet the situation? There are three ways to meet it, one by loans, the other by taxes, and another by a combination of loans and taxes. The latter is, of course, the one we will pursue. It is extremely important to my mind, however, that we make taxation the fundamental principle of our revenue-raising policy and loans the incident. We ought to have the courage and the wisdom to raise all we can possibly raise by taxes. We ought to endeavor to pay as we go, in so far as we can do so. That is business; that is just; that is wise. The loan system is calculated to produce inflation and to demoralize business. It is bad finance and it is worse morals.

We are not without advice in regard to this matter by reason of the vast amount of experience which has gone before. First, let us see what the condition of this country is with reference to meeting the financial program now confronting us. The estimated wealth of this country is something around $250,000,000,000. As we turn those figures over in our mind we feel that fundamentally we have a very sure foundation upon which to build. We not only have an estimated wealth of some $250,000,000,000, but at the time this bill is under consideration and when we begin our financial program we have back of us two years of war profits. We have already accumulated, earned, and distributed among the stockholders and the business men, and the people of the country to a certain extent, some $4,000,000,000 of war profits, covering the years 1915 and 1916. Mr. Kahn, of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., the famous bankers of New York, has estimated that this year we will have at least $2,000,000,000 in the way of war profits. I take it that any estimate coming from Mr. Kahn is not only conservative but reliable, among other reasons because of his great knowledge of the subject upon which he is passing his opinion. Others, however, have estimated the war profits of this year as high as three billion or three and a half billion dollars. At any rate, Mr. President, we have some $4,000,000,000 of earned war profits for the two years past and some two or three billion dollars being added in this year. That is the condition in a general way which supports us, so far as our ability to meet the situation is concerned.

In the light of these figures, what are we proposing to do in this bill in the way of raising taxes and in the way otherwise of issuing bonds? We will expend unquestionably this year, aside from the amounts which we send to the allies, at least $10,000,000,000. I would much prefer to say, in order that I may be more accurate, that as time goes on we will expend $15,000,000,000 in addition to the amount which we send to the allies. We are proposing to raise by this bill something over $2,000,000,000. In other words, we initiate a program with a $2,000,000,000 tax bill, depending upon bonds to cover the other eight to ten billion dollars. Mr. President, I think from every standpoint that that is an unwise program. I think it fraught with peril. I believe evils of incalculable menace will flow from it. I know it is condemned by all the experience of the past and by the great students of this subject everywhere. We are failing miserably to meet the duty devolving upon us. I think it not only unwise economically and from a financial standpoint, but I think it unjust and unfair. I do not believe that it is at all meeting this situation as it presents itself to this body.

The distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] this morning paid a feeling tribute to our posterity, saying that they would be worthy of their ancestors, and that they would take care of these amounts which we would place upon them in the way of bond issues. We need not waste any words upon posterity in the way of a tribute if we proceed to the consummation of this program, because the highest possible tribute we can pay to them is the fact that we are to take care of $2,000,000,000 and give to them from eight to ten billion dollars to take care of. They who come after us will appreciate the fact that we had full confidence in their ability, their patriotism, and their capacity to bear their portion of the burdens of the war.

They may not read the speech of the distinguished Senator from North Carolina as a tribute to them, but they will know that we have passed over to them that which will mortgage them and their posterity perhaps for a hundred years. They will know that when we were doing this there was lying alongside of us, within our easy reach, that kind of profits which come with the war and go with the war—accumulations of $2,000,000,000 and $4,000,000,000; in all, $6,000,000,000, of which we have taken in this bill the paltry sum of $562,000,000. Let us not waste words upon posterity; our deeds will tell posterity how highly we prize their ability and their patriotism in comparison with our own.

Mr. President, may I go back and briefly recur to the experience of some other countries with reference to bond issues and taxes and the proportion which they bore to each other? At the beginning of the Napoleonic wars Mr. Pitt, who had prided himself that he was to be the great peace prime minister of England, undertook to do precisely what we are here undertaking to do, to raise a comparatively small portion of the expenses of the war by taxation and to raise a very large portion—from four to five times the amount which he was to raise by taxation—by loans or by bond issue. We ought to take into consideration, however, in passing upon his plan, that he took charge of his country at a time when it was practically depleted in industrial force. England had just come out of a war of nearly a hundred years, with only short intervals of peace. Mr. Pitt did not have, as we have, untold billions of wealth and billions of accumulated war profits. He was dealing with a country which was in a large measure already undermined by war exhaustion, and there was justification for the position which he took in raising revenue by a small amount of taxes and a large amount of bonds. But had he had by him this fund which we have, a fund created by war, it is reasonable to believe his program would have been different. Mr. Pitt in the very midst of the war, at a time after his people had become less capable of taking care of taxes, was compelled to change his program entirely and to raise 50 per cent of the war expenses by taxes and the remainder by bonds. Had he not changed that program, it is the judgment of those who are capable of passing upon the question that his financial system might have done for England what Napoleon's soldiers could not do, reduced her to a subject power.

After the war had proceeded for some three or four years he changed his program entirely, and, as I have said, raised a larger sum by taxes. So when the war closed, when it was finished, according to Mr. Lloyd-George's budget speech in 1914, Mr. Pitt had raised by loans £440,000,000 and by taxes £391,000,000. But notwithstanding the change which he made, while the change enabled him to so finance the war, all writers upon the subject declare that it was the early years of Pitt's financial system which entailed upon England at the close of the war the most serious industrial depression through which that great nation ever passed. When the war closed and peace had been restored, instead of business reviving and industry again taking its place, it was found that the people were loaded with an enormous and superhuman debt which depressed where there should have been exhilaration and restrained where there should have been energy upon the part of the people. Inflation had run its enervating and demoralizing course and the common people paid the forfeit of Pitt's early mistake.

I read a paragraph from the work entitled "Finance and Politics," by a member of the English Parliament, in order to bring more clearly to the attention of the Senate this point:

> At first Pitt did not realize the gravity of the situation or appreciate the nature of the struggle into which he had been forced. France, bankrupt and apparently in a state of disruption, seemed no very formidable foe; and Pitt, greatly as he disliked the war, looked confidently to a successful struggle and an early peace. He fell, therefore, into the fatal error of making at first no special effort to meet the heavy war expenditure, and with the exception of the imposition of taxation sufficient to meet the interest and sinking funds on the new loans, he did little or nothing to prevent the increase of debt. Indeed, it was not for some four or five years after the outbreak of the war—when in France order had emerged out of chaos, when instead of being subdued she had been victorious over our allies and had actually threatened our own shores, when at home financial pressure had necessitated the suspension of specie payment and credit had fallen low indeed—that the gravity of the contest was realized and a determined effort was made to overtake the ever-increasing liabilities.

The author then gives an account of the increase of taxes and the manner in which the people responded to the increase of taxes, notwithstanding the fact that they had been crippled by the situation which had been superinduced by the bond issue; but here it is said after the close of the war, in speaking of the effect of this bond issue and the small amount of taxes raised:

> The first seven years succeeding the restoration of peace were among the darkest in modern English history. The excitement and glory of the war had evaported. Peace but accentuated its hardships and confirmed its burdens.

The author further proceeds to describe the industrial conditions and the want which prevailed throughout the country; and, in the opinion of the writer, it is attributable to the unfortunate financial system which characterized the first four years of Pitt's administration as prime minister.

When we come to the Crimean War, Mr. President, we meet for the first time with Mr. Gladstone's views upon this question. He was in favor of meeting the situation by taxes and not by bonds; in other words, making taxation the principal and the issuance of bonds the incident to a financial system. I take the time of the Senate to read a single statement from Mr. Gladstone:

The system of raising funds necessary for wars by a loan practices wholesale, systematic, and continual deception upon the people. The people do not really know what they are doing. The consequences are adjourned into a far future.

It is easy, it is a facile task to issue bonds and to pass the burden over to posterity; but we ought to bear in mind that the burden will rest upon them in a different way from what it would rest upon those of this day; for when they come to pay these bonds they will have nothing in the way of war profits or these things which enable governments to finance war out of which to meet it. At that time there will be no escape from the proposition of unloading these bonds and the interest upon the bonds upon consumption. When posterity comes to pay it, having no $2,000,000,000 to $4,000,000,000 of war profits with which to meet a portion of it, they will have to meet the bond issues and these vast interest increases by taxes upon consumption to a very large extent. There is where the deception rests; there is where the injustice is. There is the wrong, the great wrong, of this system.

How can we, Mr. President, consent to take but $562,000,000 from these billions of dollars of war profits and pass on to posterity eight or ten billion dollars in bonds? But let us not digress now. Great Britain adopted a different policy in the Crimean war. According to the budget speech of Mr. Lloyd-George they raised £32,000,000 by means of loans and £35,000,000 by means of taxes. Even that proportion, Mr. President, has received severe criticism from financiers as not being a sufficient amount of taxes and too large an amount of bonds. It was a change, however; it was a step in the right direction; and England experienced the benefit of the change of the financial system from that which had prevailed in the first years under Pitt's administration.

Mr. President, I do not want to dwell too long upon this subject, but I call attention to the War of 1812 in our own country. If I recall the figures correctly, we expended about $70,000,000 in carrying on that war and raised only about 10 per cent of it by taxation and the remainder by bonds. There is no writer upon the subject who has not criticized that policy unmercifully and who has not clearly demonstrated that the financial distress which followed the War of 1812 was the result of that system. Yet that is not very far from the policy which we are proposing to inaugurate at this time; that is not very far from the proportion which we propose to incorporate in this bill. If we should run our expenses this year to $15,000,000,000, as it is very probable we may, aside from the amount which we loan to entente allies, the proportion under the War of 1812 will not be far from the proportion which will be covered by this measure. And think of our country in 1812, and think of it now. Reflect more seriously on this situation. We have many many people struggling against the burden of high prices, many families anxious over the future because of the increased and ever increasing cost of living, which bond issues will accentuate and aggravate, and we have here this stupendous fund made out of the war, these billions coined out of the miseries of Europe, and out of this fund we take $562,000,000 and make up by putting millions upon the necessaries which sustain life in our meager homes. If this is not a moral breakdown, a shameless disregard of duty, then I have studied the cause of our country in vain.

In the beginning of the war of 1860, Mr. Chase provided for $80,000,000 in the way of taxes and a bond issue of $250,000,000—about 3 to 1. During the year of 1861, however, there were issued demand notes, afterwards transformed into "greenbacks," as they were called, to the amount of about $60,000,000. This policy was pursued for nearly two years, when Mr. Chase was compelled, out of the exigency of the situation, to change his entire policy. The peculiar and extraordinary feature of the change was that the people responded to the change and were very much gratified, as expressions went from one part of the country to the other, that the Government had adopted a system of taxation instead of a system of issuing bonds.

In his report in 1863, Mr. Chase says:

The great importance of providing beyond all contingency for our expenditures and interest on debt and for the largest possible amount of extraordinary expenditures by taxation is now manifest.

Yes, it had become manifest. The system of raising money by taxation and by bonds in the ratio of 1 to 3 or 1 to 5 had been tried, and it had failed. In the midst of war, when the people were less capable of responding, when inflation had occurred, when high prices had imposed a great burden, this extraordinary effort was made, and the people, as has been so well said, were compelled to pay, perhaps, $500,000,000 more for the prosecution of the Civil War than they would have been called upon to pay had the taxation system been adopted in the beginning.

Mr. Chase added:

It is hardly too much, perhaps hardly enough, to say that every dollar raised for extraordinary expenditures or reduction of debt is worth two in the increased value of national securities and increased facilities for the negotiation of indispensable loans.

Prof. Henry C. Adams, in his discussion of the Civil War finances in the United States, stated that:

It is not easy to overestimate the financial benefits that would have accrued if the receipts from internal revenue could have been moved forward two years.

Mr. Miller, of the Federal Reserve Board, in an address a short time ago, in referring to this matter said:

Inflation as an expedient of public finance has long been practiced, although it has never had the sanction and approval of those whose business it has been to lay down canons of finance rather than to engage in the practice of finance. The record of our own great wars and the records of the great wars of other nations in modern times show pretty uniformly that timidity in facing the serious realities of war finance has usually developed a situation from which escape was finally sought through the desperate and costly expedient of government currency inflation. Such was our disastrous experience in the Civil War, when resort was had to the greenback currency, which was nothing but a device of inflationism, and some $500,000,000 thereby added to the cost of the war——

I think, Mr. President, that I shall not pursue further the proposition of what relation our taxes should bear to our bond issues. I am not going to engage in niceties of discussion with reference to this financial question. Others here are far more able to discuss it than I in that respect, but I want to submit this plain proposition to the Senators of the United States at a time when the most tremendous task devolves upon us that ever devolved upon a Senate in the history of our country. I want to submit this plain, simple proposition, which will go home to every lay mind in this land upon whose public opinion this war must be fought: Do you think that you are meeting the situation when you take $562,000,000 from some $6,000,000,000 of war profits? How shall we face our constituencies and what answer shall we make to posterity in leaving these accumulated profits practically untouched and unscathed while we impose upon the common people of the country—and that is what a bond issue means—some $10,000,000,000 in the way of indebtedness and accumulated interest? Bonds mean that wealth will buy them, hold them, collect interest, and that when war profits are gone the necessaries of life will be taxed to pay. Is this the purpose for which we have been sent here? Is this our portion of the task?

Instead of conniving at this increase of the cost of living, instead of conspiring to aid inflation we ought to exert every energy along opposite lines. It is one of the remorseless axioms of war that, do the best we may, it is impossible to distribute its burdens, its sufferings, and sacrifices equally among the people. The poor will grow poorer and often the rich are made richer even under the most equitable and just laws which can be passed. The most of the fighting is done by the humbler or less well-to-do people—if for no other reason because there are more of them and they make up the fighting forces. They make the supreme sacrifice. When they leave their homes to go to the front those they leave behind are less equipped, less fitted to meet the struggle for existence. The rise in prices which always accompanies war and which is aggravated, as I have said, by bond issues, pinches with more poignant effect those who were but poorly living upon their means. To thousands and hundreds of thousands the rise of prices means children kept out of school, handicapped in the battle of life; means less food, stunted bodies, and disappointed and broken plans and ambitions. If in addition to all this we lay on even a slight additional tax, while it may seem slight to us, it falls with a heavy and crushing effect upon them.

To a family eagerly and anxiously planning to get through the week or the month or the year the slightest additional weight may break through their whole feebly contrived scheme of living. If the grim necessity were here to impose such a burden for the protection of our country, there would be no hesitation; but when the necessity is not here, when there are vast war profits to meet the situation, it is a betrayal of a solemn trust to impose a single additional dollar upon this class of people. We should, above all things, seek to preserve, if possible, through this fearful ordeal the physical and moral well-being of the average citizen, to protect the health and insure the physical development and outlook in life of the countless children of the poor and of the average citizen. I have no war upon wealth, I have no prejudice against the man of wealth that I am conscious of, but as between preserving profits and preserving citizenship there can be no choice. The future of the Republic rests upon the one; we can at least during the war forego the enjoyment of the other.

In dealing with this question of taxation we ought not to overlook the fact that it is the wont of a tax to seek the low man. Wherever the tax can be passed on, in time that will be done. We may think we are taxing at this point, but the incident of the tax may be elsewhere. We may suppose we are levying a tax upon this business institution or that, but when the tax comes to be paid it may be paid by the purchaser of the goods, the consumer.

In 1898 we fixed a tax upon petroleum, upon tobacco, and upon sugar in the form of what was called a corporation tax. After levying that tax we went home with the idea, apparently, that we had taxed certain large corporations. Two years afterwards investigation disclosed beyond the question of a doubt that every dollar of that tax had been passed on to the consumer. The tobacco companies, the oil companies, had not paid a dollar of the tax. Aye, in the passing on of the tax they passed on an additional charge, which they failed to take off when the tax was removed. Mr. Payne, speaking with reference to this subject in December, 1900, said:

Of course, Mr. Chairman, some may say why not put this tax directly upon the express companies and telegraph companies? Well, we did consider that, but the express companies had a right to say to their customers how much they would charge for carrying packages from place to place and could easily add the amount of the Government tax to their charges. I know sometimes gentlemen will close their eyes and proceed blindly, as was the case in dealing with the tax on the Standard Oil Co. and putting a tax on a sugar refinery, as was done. They forget to consider that these taxes might possibly not affect the companies at all, but the consumers; and a review of the history of the last two years shows what some gentlemen then anticipated when the tax went on in the Senate, that the companies not only got the amount of the tax back, but that the companies got a little additional sum from their customers to enable them to swell their dividends. That was the legislation in that regard. In other words, the tax in all instances seeks the consumer, and usually, if not arrested in its progress, it finds him and forces him to pay the amount due the Government and a little additional also to help swell the dividends of the companies upon whom it was supposed the tax was levied.

Again he says:

This latter tax—

Speaking of the tax upon insurances—is paid almost entirely by the man who receives the insurance. The man who provides for the future of his family in the event of his death by securing a life insurance or in providing an indemnity for the family—for his wife and children in case the home should burn down—was forced to pay this tax.

In another place Mr. Payne said:

If we impose this tax upon the express companies they will simply add it to their rate of freight. * * * They would simply put it back in additional charges on the people who send packages by express.

I accept the principle as wholesome, as just, as perfectly sound in morals and patriotism that every man should contribute to the support of the Government. I shall not wittingly seek through legislation to evade or eliminate that principle. I would not make wealth pay all the taxes if I could. But I know that the man with a family who has an income of $2,000 only, pays more taxes than his just proportion, though not one cent be lodged upon his income. He pays it in the tax shifted to the many things he must wear and things he must eat. He pays it in his rent, he pays it in countless ways, and at every turn of life. I do not seek to exempt; I simply seek to protect him against paying more than his rightful proportion. And then think of the thousands and hundreds of thousands still below him. Think of the man with a family in these times whose income is from $700 to $1,000 a year. Fifty per cent of the families of the United States have incomes of $800 or less. Seventy per cent of the families of our country have incomes of $1,000 or less. Tell me how a man so situated can have shelter for his family; how he can provide food and clothing. He is an industrial peon. His home is scant and pinched beyond the power of language to tell. He sees his wife and children on the ragged edge of hunger from week to week and month to month. If sickness comes, he faces suicide or crime. He can not educate his children; he can not fit them for citizenship; he can not even fit them as soldiers to die for their country. It is the tragedy of our whole national life—how these people live in such times as these. We have not yet gathered the fruits of such an industrial condition in this country. We have been saved thus far by reason of our newness in national life, our vast public lands now almost exhausted, our great natural resources now fast being seized and held, but the hour of reckoning will come. In my opinion the man who would consider that situation now, who would legislate with that condition ever in mind would be the true friend of honest wealth, the real defender of law and order, and the patriotic defender of republican institutions. I know one thing beyond peradventure, for it is written upon every page of the experience of man, that neither wealth nor order and law nor free institutions can rest upon hunger and want, upon a starved or starving proletariat. In all the history of the world there is no stupidity equal to the stupidity of wealth in the presence of economic danger. It is well illustrated by one who in a great economic crisis of the world brutally declared that if the people had not bread to eat they could eat grass and whose horrible visage was shortly thereafter floating through the streets on the end of a pike serving as a banner to an infuriated, remorseless mob of hungry human beings.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] said that we should not so tax the business of this country as to destroy its productive efficiency. We are all agreed as to that. Certainly that would be disastrous. It would injure the whole country—labor even as much as capital. Do you think, when you take $562,000,000 out of some six billion dollars of war profits, that you are destroying, or touching the line where you may destroy, the productive efficiency of this country? If you should take, in addition to $562,000,000 another $562,000,000 from the six billions of war profits, do you think you would have reached the point where you need to discuss the productive efficiency of the business of this country? If you should in this great exigency take all the war profits, leaving the normal profits, would it destroy productive efficiency?

But there is another point with reference to this question of efficiency. Neither must we destroy the efficiency, the physical well-being, or the capacity of the ordinary citizen to meet the duties and the obligations of this great war; and when you put an additional tax upon the man who has an income of $800 or $1,000 or $1,200, you are then laying a tax where it has an effect direct and substantial in the matter of efficiency.

As for me, sir, I can not comprehend, I can not understand—it is one of the unsolvable mysteries of this country in which we live—how a man with an income of $1,000 a year under the present high cost of living feeds himself and his family. Do you know that when the Boer War took place England found that the point where efficiency had broken down was with the working men in England, because they had been underfed and underclothed and insufficiently cared for, and were unable to meet the standards and the measurements which the Britons had met who had fought the wars of former years?

Let us see, Mr. President, to what extent we will affect the business interests of this country. Suppose we took 80 per cent of the war profits upon a flat rate. Let us take a few figures and see how they would escape even under that taxation, see what sacrifices they would make under such a rule as England now adopts. I have made some figures, and while I always give figures in the presence of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] with a good deal of caution, I invite his attention to them to see if I am not correct. If I am in error, I would beg to be corrected.

The American Smelting & Refining Co. in 1913 earned $9,756,540 of normal profits, peace profits. In 1916 their profits were $23,252,248. If you will take 20 per cent of that which is their war profits, the difference between $9,000,000 and $23,000,000, and add it to their peace profits, leaving to the Government 80 per cent, they would still have profits to the amount of $12,455,681. We have not touched the principal, we have not touched the normal profits, we have not touched the business capital. It is there in complete, efficient working order, with $12,000,000 to distribute among the stockholders—quite enough, sir, for the man who sits at home and draws in his profits when the soldiery of the United States are forfeiting their lives upon the front.

Let us take another—Armour & Co. In 1913 the profits of Armour & Co. amounted to $6,028,197. Their profits in 1916 were $20,100,000. Twenty per cent added to their peace profits would give them for the year 1916—it is on that basis that I am estimating—$8,842,561, something over $2,000,000 in excess of their peace profits. Shall any man complain who goes through this war, in this dread situation, a little better off than he was in time of peace?

But that is not all. The Armour Packing Co. in the year 1916, in addition to distributing that $20,000,000 of profits, issued a stock dividend of $80,000,000.

The Bethlehem Steel Co. earned in 1913 $5,122,703 in the way of profits. Their income in 1916 was $43,593,968. Twenty per cent added to their peace profits gives them for 1916, $12,816,956. I am not honored by the presence of the distinguished and able Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. I know his business capacity and his business judgment. I should like to have his opinion as to whether or not the Bethlehem Steel Co. would be affected in its productive efficiency with its capital untouched, its peace profits untouched, and some $7,000,000 of war profits added?

The Du Pont Powder Co. earned in 1913 $4,582,075 in the way of profits. In 1916 they increased their profits from $4,000,000 to $82,107,693. Take 20 per cent of the war profits and add it to their peace profits and you have undisturbed profits, untouched profits, to the amount of $20,087,198.60, nearly five times in excess of their peace profits in 1913; and they were doing fairly well and thriving fairly well even before the war came. I believe they could pull through on twenty million profits. I see no danger here of destroying productive efficiency.

The Hercules Powder Co. earned $1,017,212 in the way of profits in the year 1913. They earned $16,658,873 in 1916. Twenty per cent added to their peace profits gives them a profit of $4,145,544.20.

Phelps, Dodge & Co., a corporation, earned $7,907,710 in 1913. They earned $21,974,263 in 1916. Adding 20 per cent to their peace profits, they would still have left $10,721,020.

Swift & Co., another packing company, earned $9,250,000 in 1913. In 1916 their profits were $20,465,000. Twenty per cent added to their peace profits would give them $11,493,000 undisturbed, untaxed. In addition to that, Swift & Co. also declared a stock dividend of somewhere about $75,000,000, but I have not the exact figures.

The United States Steel Corporation had an income in 1913 of $81,216,985. Their income in 1916 was $271,531,730. Add 20 per cent to their peace profits, and you have $119,279,934.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GERRY in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am deeply interested in what the Senator is stating, and I am a little bit confused on one statement. For instance, he mentioned Swift & Co. He said its profits in 1915 were $9,000,000, and its profits in 1916 were $20,000,000. Then he adds 20 per cent of that to their peace profits?

Mr. BORAH. No; I subtract the 1913 profits from the 1916 profits and take the difference and take 20 per cent of that.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is correct. I did not understand that that was what the Senator was doing.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have a number of other figures here, showing the profits which would still remain to these companies after we had taken 80 per cent of their war profits. But I shall, in the interest of time, pursue this matter no further. I leave these figures to speak for the record.

Now, in the matter of treating these people fairly and from the standpoint of conscience and of justice, should any man desire during this war, while everybody is to sacrifice, to earn more than three or four times what he was earning in time of peace? I do not say, Mr. President, that the gentlemen who control these industries desire to do so. I do not challenge their patriotism. I do not assail their loyalty to their country by assuming that they would not be willing to make the same sacrifices that their other countrymen must make. Indeed, sir, if we are to take the statements of such men as Mr. Gary and such statements as were made by Mr. Schwab, some of them printed in the public press and some which I had the honor to hear, they would not complain if they were simply left their normal profits during the war. I do not speak for them. I am only speaking of the fact that they have said over and over again during this war that every citizen must meet the responsibility which rests upon him according to his ability to do so; and that being true, I do not assume, sir, when I advocate taking this amount of profits, that I am assailing these men or challenging their patriotism; and I will not assume so until some one who has the right to speak for them says that they are opposed to being confined to reasonable profits during this war.

I leave these figures to speak for themselves. I leave them to take care of my defense when I am charged with being unfair or radical. I leave them to answer those who say this is an attack upon wealth, and particularly I leave them to caution those who would leave such profits so slightly taxed and pass the burdens on to the necessaries of life.

Tax laws, unjust and unfair tax laws, have been the source of more misery, more agony, though often voiceless, and, finally, more bloodshed and slaughter, than any other form of legislation to which men have given their efforts. The unequal burdens of government distributed unjustly by those in power have been the undermining influence of governmental organizations time and time again. It was the refusal of the king to listen to his great finance minister, Turgot, which brought on the French Revolution. Turgot said to his king, I will redistribute these taxes. I will take off the taxes on the necessaries of life, the taxes which are crushing your peasantry and reducing 90 per cent of your people to poverty and drudgery, and breeding discontent and disloyalty everywhere, and I will lay it on the great estates, the wealth which surrounds you. The king was pleased, for while Louis did not have a great mind he had a better heart than it is usually given to kings to possess. He told the minister to proceed. The minister did not proceed far, however. The wealthy estates demanded an audience with the king on the question of taxes. They asserted they were too heavily taxed; that it would cripple his kingdom and destroy its prestige. The king listened, wavered, and in that wavering lost his head. Turgot was dismissed, the taxes were distributed as of old, hunger and want and crime came together and executed their wild system of justice, and lords and satellites and kings paid the forfeit of their crime. The French Revolution was the most stupendous exhibition of retributive justice in the history of the human race, and its origin, its source, and its moving force were the unjust tax laws of France.

Mr. President, in conclusion allow me to say we must bear in mind that this is now our war; that the citizen must meet the situation according to his ability. We must bear in mind that it is now our country that is involved; that it is a matter not of gratuity, not merely to give as you would give to Belgium suffering or to Serbia suffering. It is a situation, sir, in which each and every citizen has resting upon him the responsibilty to respond according to his capacity.

Yes; it is our war; it is an American war, and we must prepare to meet its burdens and fight its battles in harmony with American principles, in harmony with what is just and what is right to each and every member of the Republic. We are now dealing with the question of revenue, and no question will more accurately and pointedly gauge among us the spirit of democracy. No problem with which we shall have to deal will more thoroughly reveal our real faith in the great principle for which we are fighting. If there is any question among men that will uncover human character, it is the laying on of a tax, and we are now dealing with a proposition which will reveal to all just how sincere we are when we say that we are in this contest for democracy.

In this struggle some will lay down their lives. Some will give up their chosen companions. Some will yield the prop and stay of old age, and some as a result of the war will carry on through life broken health and maimed and diseased bodies. Now the question is, will ease, will luxury, will wealth lay upon the same common altar not merely of their excess, not merely of their surplus but that which also represents sacrifice? Will the people who are abundantly blessed give up their surplus estates, their gathered wealth; will they, too, deny themselves in the hour of national danger? We are entering a period of sacrifice and these sacrifices must be borne and shared in accordance with the ability of the respective citizens to bear them and to share them. If this is a fight to make democracy universal let us also make it a fight to make democracy decent and just—to make democracy real and worth while. If when this fearful struggle is past and men look back upon the awful tragedy and reflect upon its sorrows and its sufferings it shall be found that the great burdens of the war have been borne and are to be borne by those of limited means, by those of a mere competency, by labor, and by the man of small salary, as will be true under a loan system, while a few have still gathered wealth and made vast fortunes, God pity the future of this country. Men will mock at your Government; they will deride your democracy; they will denounce your Republic and its Constitution, and discontent, disobedience, lawlessness, and disaffection will permeate and demoralize the whole vast fabric of our free institutions. If when the war shall have closed and peace has come you would have respect for your Government, obedience to her laws, and devotion to the flag, make no mistake as to the equitable distributions of the burdens of this great war.

The war has already served to widen the economic chasm in the life of our people. The increased cost of living accentuated in part by the war has already weighed most heavily upon the working and producing classes, while a few have gathered millions and accumulated vast fortunes. If you say to me that wages have increased, my answer is that only in certain vocations and in those by no means in proportion to the increased cost of living.

Last winter we saw widespread suffering and want. Investigation disclosed that hundreds and thousands of children were underclothed and insufficiently fed and were being deprived of schooling. This was in a time of peace. Indeed, the most serious effect of the war in our country thus far has been the way in which it has weighed down upon the man of ordinary means. In other words, the war has already served to take from those who had not and give to those who had. I do not myself want to overlook this fact in dealing with this problem. I do not think it is wise or just that we should overlook it. I think the future contentment and happiness of our people demand that we should not overlook it. If anyone supposes that public opinion in this country upon these questions is at ease and content, he is greatly in error. The fires of passion burn low, but they are widespread and it will not require any extraordinary event to cause them to burst forth. Let us so construct our revenue laws that there may not be any cause for resentment, any sense of injustice, any feeling of revolt. It makes no difference what the outward form of our government may be, how splendidly our institutions are framed, if there is not content among the people, if there is not a feeling throughout of equity and justice, of equal laws, there can be neither strength nor guaranty of perpetuity. The Good Book tells us that beneath the purple robes of power the worms coiled and crawled and fed upon Herod's body and he gave up the ghost. At a time when we are reaching out to maintain our prestige upon the sea and to carry success and relief to other nations let us make sure that discontent and dissatisfaction, injustice and inequity do not wither up a nation's soul at home.

In the name of a country which we love, in the name of those free institutions in the ultimate triumph of which is to be found the final solution of the great problem of free government, whatever else we do in this great struggle, let us preserve justice and equality of burden as nearly as we can at home and among our own people. Let us guard with vigilance the indispensable virtues and principles of our own democracy. Let us as a Senate be brave enough and strong enough and patriotic enough to equalize as nearly as we may the load now pressing down upon our people.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, so far I have not spoken during the consideration of this bill. And now about all I have to say is that I would like to see the bill as reported agreed to by the Senate. I support the bill as reported. I had not supposed that it would be worth while for me to address the Senate in support of this measure, and I doubt if it can be of any possible advantage for me to do so now. I have supposed that the masterful presentation by the chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. SIMMONS], supported as it has been most ably in the addresses of the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and others, would be sufficient; but now, to my surprise, I find that there is an unexpected and somewhat formidable opposition to the bill. Therefore, as a member of the Finance Committee, I am not willing to sit silent in the face of this opposition.

Mr. President, this bill is the composite work of the Finance Committee. This composite work does not represent the individual view of any single member of that committee. The committee had a hard task before it. It labored assiduously and faithfully for many weeks. There are provisions in the bill that I may say various individual members of the committee did not favor. There are provisions in the bill I did not approve, and things left out of the bill I personally sought to incorporate in it. What I say of myself is true of every member of the committee. Indeed, Mr. President, that is almost always true of all committees having under consideration important subjects of legislation like this.

I join in the well-deserved compliment paid to the chairman of the Finance Committee [Mr. SIMMONS] by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] on Wednesday; but the chairman had no more his way than any other member of the committee had his way.

And I wish to impress this because of some things that have just come to me here and which in large measure have induced me to take the floor. The chairman of the committee did not have his way any more than any other member of the committee had his way. Of course, the diligent, laborious work of the chairman reflected its influence, as it should have done, on the membership of the committee. There is not a member of the committee who will not vouch for the absolute verity of the statement I make that the report made by the chairman represents the final judgment of the committee itself.

After a long and tedious service, the committee, aided by the best experts the Government could furnish and after a patient hearing from selected representatives of almost every important industry affected, agreed upon the bill as reported. As I have said, the bill does not represent the individual view of any member of the committee. It is a composite work, the joint result of work done by numerous men—I think sincere and honest men—having divergent opinions. At the end of our deliberations the committee directed the chairman of the committee, the Senator from North Carolina, to report the bill as finally agreed upon to the Senate. Three or four Senators reserved the right to present or re-present certain particular disputed questions to the judgment of the Senate, and 3 out of 17 members of the committee disagreeing to the final action of the committee reserved the privilege of presenting a minority report. After that, the committee as a whole voted to direct the chairman of the committee to report the bill as finally adopted.

These particular remarks may not be of especial interest to Senators generally, for I am now addressing myself especially to the members of the Finance Committee.

Mr. President, whenever, as a member of a committee, I vote to direct the chairman of the committee to report a bill to the Senate I shall support him. As a member of a committee I have no right to direct the chairman to report a bill to the Senate and then throw the whole burden of maintaining the bill—the whole responsibility of conducting it—upon him. There is a sense of personal honor and obligation in all this, as I think. If I were not willing to stand by the chairman and aid him I would not direct him to report the bill; I would not throw the whole burden upon his shoulders and desert him when the stress was on. I thus address myself with freedom and on my own responsibility to Senators who are my colleagues on the Finance Committee.

The three Senators mentioned—the Senators from Wisconsin, Colorado, and Oklahoma—declared their opposition to the bill agreed upon and reserved the right to present a minority report. Against that I have nothing to say. Other Senators reserved the right to present certain specific questions passed on by the committee to which they did not individually agree. There were only three or four such reservations made. Beyond that the committee, 14 to 3, directed the Senator from North Carolina to present this bill to the Senate.

I do not know how other members of the committee feel about it, but for mysif I say to my colleagues on the committee I shall not be recreant and leave the chairman to shoulder the whole responsibility of the bill which he has reported by our direction. But after all I think he could well afford to shoulder the whole responsibility, but that is not fair to him. For myself, I shall support the bill as reported.

MY PERSONAL ATTITUDE.

Mr. President, we are at war; you know that I did not approve this war adventure. But as long as we are in war we must fight, and successful fighting requires, among other very essential things, that we should provide the financial sinews of war. How are these necessary financial resources to be supplied? I know only two ways, namely, first, by levying taxes on the people, and, secondly, by asking loans to the Government.

Immediate taxes are always an immediate burden on the people and on the industries of the country. Loans are a burden transmitted to those who succeed us. With respect to this division of burden as between the present and future generations, I have heretofore declared my attitude. But, repeating what I have previously said, I believe that the greater part of the burden of this war upon which we have entered should be imposed on the people of this generation, who are responsible for it. Fundamentally that position is sound, and I stand for it. But as we go along we must be sensible; we must be always very conscious of the tremendous task we have undertaken, and the successful execution of that task is, in my opinion, very, very largely dependent upon the uninterrupted, continuing activity of the multitudinous industries of the country. And so, from the start, I maintained before the Finance Committee what I here maintain, that it was the part of wisdom to make the immediate increased tax burden as light as possible to meet the exigencies pressing upon the Government. Already, before this bill came to us, the burden of taxation in various forms had been enormously augmented; already these burdens of taxation were without precedent. I could not ignore that fact. Then came this new demand upon us. The immediate question presented was that the committee should provide for approximately $4,000,000,000 additional revenue for the uses of our own Government. This did not include the loan of other billions to the allies nor include other things I will not stop to specify. It concerned only our own immediate governmental needs. Therefore the immediate question before the committee was how to raise this enormous sum called for by the Government for their own urgent uses. The Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, recommended that this new burden of some four or five billion dollars should be divided so as to impose something like one half the weight of the burden in the form of immediate taxes on the people and that the remaining half should be floated in the form of bonds to be redeemed at a more or less remote period. Personally I doubted the wisdom of laying as much as $2,000,000,000 of new taxes in bulk for immediate assessment and collection. Before the committee I took the position—I think I was the first to urge that position—that the two billion to be levied on this immediate generation should be split up, so as to make it payable by annual installments.

My idea was this: To levy one-fourth or one-third of this vast sum for immediate collection during the current year, and that the remainder should be divided into three or four installments, the deferred installments to be taken care of by Treasury certificates or some form of serial obligations to be taken up within fixed periods. My idea was that some such proposition as indicated should be made the basis for actual collections during the current fiscal year and that the remainder required for the fiscal year should be divided into such installments as I have indicated, to be taken up in one to three years, as might be deemed most advisable. My idea was to have these deferred payments taken up by issuing short-time Treasury obligations, interest bearing and nontaxable. Further, my idea was that these obligations should be issued in small denominations—ranging from ten dollars to a thousand dollars—in the belief that while they would not have the quality of a legal-tender currency—and this itself would avoid the danger of inflation—they would in a large way pass current for the time being; and I thought this in itself would be an important advantage to the Government in making contracts for supplies. But all that is a big question not worth while at this moment to discuss. Later on it may become important. I may say, Mr. President, I was only seeking some way to avoid the imposition of an excessive burden of taxation on industrial activity. In principle my suggestion was seemingly approved by a majority of the committee, although not visibly apparent in the construction of the bill.

Mr. President, as a fundamental policy I believe that a great part—yes, the greater part—of this tax burden falling upon us now should be borne by the people of this day and generation; but I can not convince myself that it is a wise policy to impose too great a part of this burden on our industries in a single year. I thought and still think it would have been wiser to levy approximately one-third of this required amount for collection this year and to limit the other two-thirds to be collected in equal parts in the next two succeeding years—something like that.

Surely it must be that the per cent the committee has recommended for immediate assessment and collection is as much as the industries of the country should be made to bear in a single year. Productivity depends on the vital energy and activity of industry; and upon that in a very great degree the revenues of the Government correspondingly depend.

New tax burdens are to follow those we are imposing by this bill. The extent of these additional burdens no man can now foretell. Since we declared war we have already expended or incurred obligations amounting to approximately $17,000,000,000. Our total national wealth is estimated at about $180,000,000,000, and economists tell us that when our obligations reach forty billions we will have arrived close to the line which divides national solvency from national insolvency. Therefore, is it not evident that we should move with deliberate thought and careful step as we go forward with this dangerous enterprise upon which we are embarked? There are certain things we must keep in mind, namely, (1) the success of the war; (2) the raising of revenues essential to the prosecution of the war, and to this end that the prime sources of revenue shall not be unduly impaired; (3) the ultimate solvency of the Nation.

Mr. President, to reach a true solution of these great problems, we must move studiously and with caution. It is easy for any Senator to start something on the floor of the Senate; it is easy to kick up a row, leading to possible confusion and likely to hasty and unwise conclusions; but, Senators, we should not lose our heads. The influence, the pressure, of the present moment—even the politics of the present moment—must not make us forget there is a future or forget the task we have in hand.

Mr. President, in dealing with questions of this kind now daily coming to me, I deal with them patriotically. I do not permit my convictions as to the unwisdom of this war to enter into my calculations. I merely recognize the fact that we are in war, and that in that emergency it is my duty to serve my country in the same spirit in which I would serve it if I had been an advocate, instead of an opponent, of this war policy. As long as we are in the war I shall support the Congress which declared war, and the President who is prosecuting it, with respect to every proposal which concerns the effective execution of the congressional mandate. The question before us this hour is one of those questions—that is, the question of raising money, the wisest and best way of raising money to wage war.

Mr. President, in my opinion it would be the height of unwisdom at this juncture to go further than the committee has in the way of imposing taxes on the industries of the country and the individual resources of the people. Moreover, I desire to say that I regard it as fallacious to contend, as it has been here contended, that substantially all the burdens of the war should be laid upon two or three sources of revenue. This is said to be a war for world democracy, a war that will give assurance to democracy that it shall have a chance to live and flourish. If that be true—if, indeed, that be the spirit of the people—then it must be that it is a war in which every man and woman in America is vitally interested; and if that be true, then everyone who is able should contribute something in some way to the maintenance of this crusade, for it is a crusade. I have always believed that even in normal times the burdens of maintaining the Government should be as universally distributed among all the people as it is possible equitably to distribute them. Above all things, I hate the idea that only the rich shall pay taxes and support the Government. I am a poor man, but I say that. Any other theory would make this a rich man's government. Possibly it may be that sort of government now, but let us adopt no public policy admitting it. Is it not true that to the extent that men and women contribute nothing to the support of the Government, to that extent they lose the patriotic spirit, and lose the sense of personal responsibility? Let everyone do his part. That is the true doctrine; that is the true American spirit; that spirit lies at the very base of our democratic institutions, and every time we do anything to weaken or ignore this great basic principle of universal American individual responsibility and the right and duty of individual participation in the affairs of the Government, including the burdens of the Government, to that extent we undermine the very foundations of the Republic.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I desire to inquire whether we shall probably be able to reach a vote on this amendment to-night?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I intended to submit some remarks at length upon the pending amendment in answer to a number of statements that have been made, but there seems to be an evident feeling among Senators that they would prefer to vote at this time. Therefore I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma that I shall not take the floor, and as far as I am personally concerned I shall be content with a vote upon the amendment right now.

Mr. OWEN. I shall be very glad to defer to the wishes of Senators, if that is the desire.

Mr. SMOOT. Then the Senator can follow with his remarks after the vote is taken.

Mr. OWEN. I shall be pleased to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. On that the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hitchcock	McNary	Simmons
Beckham	Hollis	Martin	Smith, Ga.
Brady	Husting	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	James	New	Smith, S. C.
Calder	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Smoot
Colt	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Sterling
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Owen	Stone
Curtis	Kellogg	Page	Sutherland
Dillingham	Kendrick	Penrose	Swanson
Fletcher	King	Phelan	Thompson
France	Kirby	Poindexter	Trammell
Frelinghuysen	Knox	Reed	Vardaman
Gerry	La Follette	Robinson	Wadsworth
Gronna	Lewis	Saulsbury	Watson
Hale	Lodge	Shafroth	Weeks
Harding	McCumber	Sheppard	Wolcott
Hardwick	McKellar	Shields

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness, and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], on which the yeas and nays have been called for and ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], but I understand that he would vote as I shall vote on this question. I vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. Because of his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. KNOX (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. As I do not see him present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. The senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] has a pair with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN]. We have arranged to transfer these pairs, so that the Senator from Colorado may stand paired with the Senator from Connecticut, allowing both the Senator from Montana and myself to vote. I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], who is absent, which pair I transfer to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] on the terms stated by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. I vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. By arrangement, that pair may be transferred to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who is also absent, thus permitting me to vote. I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who is absent; but as I am informed that he would vote to sustain the committee I will release the pair, so that it may be used, if necessary, with some other absent Senator, and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when Mr. WALSH's name was called). My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent on account of illness. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN].

Mr. LEWIS (when Mr. WILLIAMS's name was called). I announce the absence of the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] on official business. His pair and the situation in regard to it has been stated by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and vote "nay."

Mr. HARDING (after having voted in the negative). When my name was called I answered and voted in the negative. I note the absence of my general pair, the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], but I have been informed that if he were present he would vote as I have voted. I will therefore allow my vote to stand.

Mr. KNOX. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] to the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and vote "nay."

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] on account of illness. He is paired with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF].

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] is paired with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] are necessarily absent on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 58, as follows:

YEAS—21.

Borah	Husting	McKellar	Townsend
Brady	Johnson, Cal.	McNary	Trammell

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is so ordered.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I offer an amendment, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. McCUMBER. I offer an amendment, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is so ordered.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] has advised me that he desires to occupy some time about another matter than the bill. I will ask, therefore, that the bill be temporarily laid aside, not to be taken up again this afternoon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be temporarily laid aside.

PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, on August 20 I introduced a joint resolution which I think may have a most far-reaching effect upon this war if it should meet the approval of the Congress.

This joint resolution proposes, as a war measure, an international convention for the purpose of terminating international anarchy, establishing international government in lieu thereof, and coercing the Teutonic military conspiracy by the organized commercial, financial, military, and naval powers of the world. I desire to read the joint resolution to the Senate, because it explains itself, requires but little explanation, and is the shortest way in which to present the proposals which I wish to offer.

"A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 94) proposing as a war measure an international convention for the purpose of terminating international anarchy, establishing international government in lieu therof, and coercing the Teutonic military conspiracy by the organized commercial, financial, military, and naval powers of the world.

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it is the opinion of the representatives of the people of the United States assembled in Congress that international government, supported by international force, should be immediately organized to take the place of the existing international anarchy; that competing armaments should be replaced by a noncompetitive international army and navy; that the Teutonic military conspiracy to dominate the world should be overthrown by the combined commercial, financial, military, and naval powers of the world.

"That international government should be based upon the following principles:

"First. Every civilized nation and informed people should have the unquestionable right of internal self-government, with exclusive control within its own territory over immigration, emigration, imports, exports, and all internal affairs, with the right to make its own political and commercial affiliations.

"Second. The oceans and high seas should be free and open under international rules. All international waterways, straits, and canals should be open on equal terms to the citizens of all nations. Equal terms should be arranged for fuel, repairs, and dockage in all ports for the ships belonging to the citizens of all nations.

"Third. All interior nations having no seaports should have the right of shipment of their goods in bond on equal terms and conditions, without tax, through any intervening territory to the seaports of any other nation with equal access to shipping facilities.

"Fourth. That there should be established by international agreement an international organization of all civilized nations with an international legislative council to draft rules of international law to be submitted to the several nations for approval. That when such rules of international law are approved by the parliaments, or lawmaking branch of the governments of three-fourths of the member nations, representing three-fourths of the total population of all the member nations, such international rules should be binding on all member nations. Such rules should be limited to the powers expressly delegated to such international legislative council and strictly confined to international affairs.

"Fifth. The international legislative council should elect and define the duties of a representative international executive cabinet to execute and enforce the rules established as international law.

"Sixth. The international legislative council should have representatives from each member nation exercising a voting power according to relative population, relative wealth, and relative governmental development, to be determined by international agreement.

"Seventh. The international legislative council should establish and define the duties of an international supreme court, with power to pass upon all questions of international controversy incapable of diplomatic adjustment but with no power to pass on questions affecting the reserved rights of nations.

"Eighth. The international legislative council should formulate the method for raising an international army and navy and for establishing an international blockade and other means for enforcing the rights of member nations under international law, such army and navy to be provided and sustained by the member nations pro rata according to relative population and wealth.

"Ninth. With the conclusion of the present war the nations of the world should agree to reduce in progressive stages their land and sea forces to a point preferably not to exceed internal or local police purposes and the quota required for the international army and navy.

"With progressive disarmament and international peace safeguarded by world government dissatisfied nations now held captive by dominant nations for strategical purposes could be safely given their liberty.

"Tenth. That the international army and navy should not be authorized to exercise military force further than to prevent or suppress the invasion of the territorial integrity of any of the member nations and in the blockade and embargo to enforce international law.

"Eleventh. That it should be a violation of international law and the highest international crime for any nation on any alleged ground to invade the territorial limits of another nation. The penalty of such invasion should be immediate international blockade of the invading nation, embargo on all mail, express, and freight to or from such nation, and the suppression of such invasion by the international army and navy.

"Twelfth. That nations backward in education, industrial, and economic development, and in the knowledge of the principles of government should have their rights safeguarded on the principles of freedom, humanity, and justice by international agreement with a view to future self-government.

"Thirteenth. It is clearly realized that the program of progressive disarmament or permanent world peace is impossible of attainment until the military forces now ruling the Teutonic people, first, either voluntarily acquiesce in progressive disarmament and international justice as the basis of world peace; second, are forced to do so by the Teutonic people; or, third, are coerced to do so by the combined powers of the world.

"Fourteenth. That in order to bring this war to an early termination, the belligerent nations opposing the Teutonic powers should immediately cohere on a plan of international government pledging justice and peace to all member nations and the coercion of the military autocracy of Prussia by the commercial, financial, military, and naval forces of the world, giving assurance, nevertheless, to the Governments of Germany and Austria of their willingness to admit the Teutonic powers as members of the proposed international union on equal terms with other nations when they shall have met the conditions and given satisfactory guaranties.

"Fifteenth. In our opinion no reliance should be placed upon the vague suggestions of peace of the Teutonic military autocracy, but that their obscure proposals should be regarded merely as a military ruse. The peace resolution of the Reichstag, while promising well for the attitude of the German people, when they achieve self-government, can not at present be regarded as a proposal binding on or capable of enforcement by the German people, because they do not control their own Government, but are mere subjects and puppets of a military autocracy which has long conspired and still dreams of conquering the world by military force and terrorism. The United States and the nations opposing militarism should strenuously prosecute the war with every available resource, and no separate peace should be made by any of them until the menace of the military autocracy of Germany is removed.

"Sixteenth. It is our opinion that if a world-wide agreement can be established on the above principles, and the men now engaged in slaughter and destructive activities can be returned to productive industry, the world could quickly recover the gigantic shock of the present war and would be able without serious difficulty to soon repair the material injuries and losses already suffered.

"Seventeenth. The United States does not enter this war for material advantage, for any selfish purpose, or to gratify either malice or ambition. The United States will not approve forcible annexations or mere punitive indemnities, but it will approve a free Poland, the restoration of territory wrongfully taken from France and Italy, and restorative indemnity to Belgium and Serbia, and the adjustment of other differences by international conferences. It will favor extending international credits for the restoration of all places made waste by war. The United States enters this war in self-defense; to protect its own citizens and the nations of the world in their present and future rights to life and liberty on land and sea. It does not wish the world to remain an armed camp.

"Eighteenth. No peace is desirable until the world can be safeguarded against a repetition of the present war. Competitive armaments must be ended and replaced by international cooperative armaments in order to assure permanent world peace.

"Nineteenth. That the President of the United States shall immediately submit the above resolution to the belligerent nations now defending themselves against Prussian military autocracy and invite them and all neutral nations by wire to an international convention for the purpose of considering the above principles and taking affirmative action for the early suppression of the Teutonic military autocratic conspiracy by the combined commercial, financial, military, and naval powers of all nations.

"Twentieth. The sum of $400,000 is hereby appropriated to meet the cost of promoting such convention."

Mr. President, in waging war on the Prussian military autocracy for the suppression of its conspiracy to rule the whole world by military force and terrorism the people of the United States have determined to use every resource at their command until this object is accomplished.

The Pan-German leaders are in control of the governmental powers and of the Army and Navy of Germany. They demand world power. They demand annexations and indemnities. They regard treaties as scraps of paper. They have terrorized the seas, made war on us and on all nations, and conspired against our future peace. They are using the German people as puppets and pawns on the checkerboard of war.

In vain do the democratic elements of Germany—the sane elements of Germany—urge international justice. The military autocracy denounces the voice of moderation, of justice, of international reconciliation, except on their own terms and future dominance. They pretend to be willing to make peace, but it is a peace dictated by German victory that will leave the military group stronger than ever. They pretend to favor peace, but it is for the object of demoralizing the war-making activities of free Russia and of other opposing nations, while the military group gird up their loins for more strenuous efforts of a German victory with arms.

The conspiracy of the Prussian military autocracy to rule the world and destroy the democracies of the world is of long standing, as the secret treaty of Verona completely demonstrates. They capture neighboring territory and put the inhabitants to laboring for the military powers. They capture adjacent people and put the inhabitants in the trenches with rifles to help the military conspiracy in its lust for world-wide conquest.

Mr. President, heretofore I have submitted the language of the secret treaty of Verona. I call the attention of Senators again to this vital doctrine of the Hohenzollerns, the Hapsburgs, the Romanoffs, the Bourbons. It is strange it ever found the light of day. I beg you to listen to this language. It was made in 1822 and resulted in our issuance of the Monroe doctrine to tell them to keep off our democratic Western Hemisphere.

SECRET TREATY OF VERONA.

The undersigned, specially authorized to make some additions to the treaty of the holy alliance, after having exchanged their respective credentials, they agreed as follows:

ARTICLE 1. The high contracting powers, being convinced that the system of representative government is equally as incompatible with the monarchical principles as the maximum of the sovereignty of the people with the divine right, engage mutually, in the most solemn manner, to use all their efforts to put an end to representative governments and to prevent its being introduced in those countries where it is not yet known.

(See the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Aug. 13, 1917, p. 5983.)

Article 2 of that treaty pledged the destruction of the liberty of the press, because it was an agency by which representative governments, by which the liberty of men, made progress.

This treaty was framed in the interest of and signed by Metternich, representing the Hapsburg dynasty of Austria; by Bernstet, representing the Hohenzollerns of Prussia; by Nesselrode, representing the Romanoffs of Russia.

The Hohenzollerns have steadily pursued the policy to which it solemnly pledged its efforts in this treaty to destroy the democracies of the world and to suppress the liberty of the press.

They now have behind their policy 170,000,000 people—Bulgaria, Turkey, Austria—under the masterful control of the Prussian autocracy.

The world has not aroused itself any too soon if it wishes the democracies to survive.

It would be an act of madness for the world to temporize with this spirit, with this set and fixed policy of the Hohenzollerns of the Prussian autocracy.

German diplomacy throughout the world has been busy in weakening other nations whose powers might be used against the military autocracy.

I submit the record of the Hohenzollerns as compiled by the Security League (Exhibit D), which is convincing to any student of history.

They have gone to South America, to Central America, and to Mexico, and have made those people believe that the United States, loving liberty as it does, willing to make sacrifices for the good of mankind as it has been, free as it is from any desire to annex the territory of other nations—they have made those nations of the Western Hemisphere believe that the United States was the Collossus of the north, waiting a convenient time in which to absorb them and their property and overthrow their liberty.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am in full sympathy with what the Senator states. Would the Senator favor waging war to depose the present reigning house of Germany?

Mr. OWEN. Absolutely. That is what I am waging war on right now.

Mr. SHERMAN. And not leave it to the German people?

Mr. OWEN. And not leave it to the German people. I am not willing that the German people should be led by the Hohenzollern house under a military autocracy that threatens every neighboring nation and has finally gotten in its grasp 170,000,000 threatening the democracy of the world. If the Germans wish to use the Hohenzollerns as a social ornament, we should perhaps raise no objection; but if they use them as the head and front of a conspiracy to assault the democracies of the world and threaten our future peace, we should not agree to it; if the Hohenzollerns use the Germans, and, dominating them, compel the poor Germans to make war on others, then even the Germans should help to put this Jonah into the sea.

Mr. SHERMAN. May I inquire further if the Senator would restore the independence of Bohemia as a part of the Austria-Hungary Empire?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the policies which are being laid down in this joint resolution will lead to the liberties of all the Teutonic people, including the people of Bohemia.

Mr. SHERMAN. That would follow with the restoration of Poland?

Mr. OWEN. It would follow with the restoration of liberty.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask specifically about Poland.

Mr. OWEN. I will answer the Senator by saying that both the German authorities and the Russian authorities agree upon an independent Poland. They differ as to means.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was the point. I wish to go along with the Senator on all these things. I think we are substantially agreed that the restoration of Poland will require some disciplining of one of our present allies. In 1772 the original partition of Poland by Russia, Austria, and Prussia took place.

Mr. OWEN. I will place in the RECORD—that was done by the Romanoffs, by the Hapsburgs, by the Hohenzollerns—I will place in the RECORD now the evidence that free Russia desires a free Poland.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no difference between the Senator and myself on that.

Mr. OWEN. No, there is no difference, I am sure, in policies and purposes between the Senator and myself. The time has come for the United States to use every energy to organize the powers of the whole world in suppressing the Teutonic military autocracy and suppressing forever its conspiracy to rule mankind by military force and terrorism.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. The President not long ago, within the last two years, said that each independent sovereignty has a right to determine its own form of government. He was particularly speaking of Mexico at that time. That does not apply to Germany, does it?

Mr. OWEN. I think it does most fully, most completely. That is what I desire and hope to see.

Mr. President, in organizing the world to break down the Teutonic military conspiracy against the world the world should, nevertheless, give assurance to the Teutonic people that the world does not wish to crush the Teutonic people or require of them more than absolute justice demands in the way of restoring territory wrongfully taken, property seized, appropriated, or destroyed by the Teutonic people under the leadership of the Prussian military autocracy.

I have submitted Senate joint resolution No. 94, containing a plan which I believe will lead to an earlier overthrow of the Teutonic military conspiracy, which will lead to an earlier awakening of the Teutonic people to the danger of such leadership, and to the necessity of their demanding the right of self-government in order that sanity may be restored to their councils. My proposal is an immediate international convention of all belligerent and neutral nations to establish an international government, with legislative, executive, and judicial powers and an army and navy to enforce the rights of member nations and to coerce Prussian militarism.

Mr. President, we have not any international law. The so-called Hague Conventions are scraps of paper; they are unanimous-consent agreements. Behind those conventions the Hohenzollerns concealed their military preparations until they could pounce upon their neighbors unawares. Those conventions are worse than useless, they have served an evil purpose. But the fact that 32 nations there agreed upon the adoption of compulsory arbitration, the fact that 32 nations there desired to bring about a means of ending international war and anarchy, the fact that those 32 nations represent seven-eighths of the people of the world, gives every reason to us to believe that they could now be cohered together in such a way as not to interfere with individual nations, not to interfere within the bounds of any nation, but use the combined efforts of all to prevent any nation becoming an international outlaw and threatening the liberties of the world.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. What would the Senator do with the German philosophers like Nietzsche and historians like Treitchszke?

Mr. OWEN. I would leave them to the German people, who will take care of them.

Mr. SHERMAN. They are the responsible foundation, Mr. President, of the servility of the German people who have submitted to the doctrines of militarism.

Mr. OWEN. I can not agree with the Senator from Illinois in that respect.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will permit me, the philosophy of Neitzsche is the foundation for the work of all the German professors who have led to the subordination of the civil to the military power.

Mr. OWEN. That is quite true; but these professors and these teachers are the hirelings of the Hohenzollerns, who for over a hundred years have had eulogy after eulogy paid for in Germany.

The Hohenzollerns are responsible for these moral, historical, psychological lunatics who have helped to make German opinion insane.

Mr. President, some critic has said, in relation to this world cooperation which I propose, "This is Utopia."

My answer is, first, Utopia is better than hell, and, second, that this proposition is not Utopian, and, third, it is already nearly an accomplished fact in the union of the great belligerents now waging a common war on Prussianism. Seventeen nations are now cohering on the battle line of Russia, of Italy, of Belgium, of France; 17 nations now are bound together in bonds of steel and of brotherhood against military autocracy ruling the world. We have only to take the step to bring them together around the council table, but it takes initiative to do it. Some nation has got to take the first step of inviting cooperation.

I pray the Father of us all it may be our great Republic that may perform this humane task and justify the prophecy of France in giving us the Bartholdi Statue—

"LIBERTY ENLIGHTENING THE WORLD."

You will remember, Senators, that in 1899 Nicholas, although a Romanoff, in the compassion of his heart, proposed to the nations of the world gradual and universal disarmament. Who was it that defeated it? It was William II and his Teutonic group of military autocrats. Who was it, when The Hague Convention met in 1899, stood in the way of a similar proposal? It was the same group. Who was it, in 1907, who prevented the coherence of the world to prevent future wars? It was the Teutonic group again, led by William II.

Mr. President, without any adequate organized effort on the part of the United States, 17 out of 44 nations at The Hague have already declared war on the Prussian autocracy, to wit, Great Britain, the United States, France, Portugal, Italy, Russia, Serbia, Montenegro, Roumania, Greece, Japan, China, and little Cuba, and Panama, and Siam, and Liberia, and San Marino. These nations now at war with the Prussian military autocracy represent over three-fourths of the people of the whole world.

Brazil, Bolivia, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Haiti have severed diplomatic relations and are on the point of war.

Argentina, Peru, Chile, and others are on the point of severing diplomatic relations.

Seven-eighths of the people of the world are at heart opposed to the ambitions of the Prussian military autocracy, and the United States should strenuously take steps to induce every neutral nation to combine with the entente allies in making war on the Prussian military autocracy. There are compelling reasons to justify the neutral nations to cooperate. We should give voice at the same time to the aspirations of mankind for the establishment of a means by which to assure through all future time the liberty, the peace, the happiness of all mankind. This is what every nation wants. China, the reserved, the oldest of organized nations, understands this, as shown by the presidential mandate declaring war on the Teutonic powers.

I beg Senators to listen to this language of the Far East. The proclamation declares:

The chief aim of this declaration is to put an end to the calamities of war and hasten the restoration of peace. * * * Until considerations involving the existence of the nation forced this momentous decision, it was not thought possible that its rights—under international law should have become impaired, the peace of the world retarded, and the position of the family of nations undermined. We are forced to fight in reestablishing the family of nations and to share in the happiness and benefits to be derived therefrom.

This mandate was signed by the premier of China and all the ministers.

Those ideas undoubtedly are American ideas, and if they were not transplanted to China previously, certainly they were presented by the representatives of the United States now at Pekin. What persuades China will be persuasive also as to other nations.

Every nation which has already declared war upon the Prussian military autocracy has been moved by the spirit of self-defense against an international outlaw, against international anarchy, and in safeguarding its own future peace.

And the same considerations which have moved 17 nations to declare war, representing three-fourths of the inhabitants of the world, will suffice to cohere them in an international government against a future war by the Prussian military autocracy, and persuade every other self-respecting nation of the world to adhere to the same policy, except perhaps Denmark, Holland, and Switzerland, who stand in deadly awe of the contiguous Teutonic military forces, and they will adhere when the present war is over.

Mr. President, I believe the principles which are laid down in the proposed resolution as a basis of international government will be acceptable, in substance, to all the nations of the world, and to the better elements of the Teutonic people, but are not acceptable, of course, to the war-mad Prusian Pan-German elements. The Pan-German element demanding the doctrine of "Deutschland Uber Alles" will have to be coerced at home or conquered by foreign armies.

There is some reason to believe that the German people are about to awake from their dreams, and that even the military group may be coerced by German opinion; but certainly the world will never permit to prevail the conception of Gen. Von Liebert, a spokesman of the German war party, who is quoted in a speech at Rathenow, Prussia (Washington Post, Aug. 20, p. 3), as saying:

We can not sign a peace before we have Flanders coast, a colonial empire, and maritime bases. Should we not realize this now, we must prepare to work for it after the war in view of the next war.

Mr. President, the Prussian military autocracy is not going to have the power or opportunity to lead the world into any "next war." It is going to be disarmed by force, if necessary; and if the German people insist upon backing this war-mad Prussian conspiracy, the German people will unavoidably reap more unhappy consequences than are already in sight.

Gen. Von Liebert does not express the body of German opinion. The majority of the Reichstag seem ready for peace and to abandon the Pan-German military program of annexation and indemnity on their neighbors as a condition of peace. The willingness of the Reichstag to forgive Belgium and France and excuse them from the payment of indemnities is a sample of Teutonic magnanimity and lack of humor.

Hugo Haase on July 19 offered a resolution in the Reichstag representing a minority view, however, which shows some evidence of sanity, as follows:

The Reichstag strives for a peace without annexations of any kind whatever, and without war indemnification, upon the basis of the rights of the peoples to decide their own destinies. In particular, it expects the restoration of Belgium and the repair of the wrong done to Belgium. The Reichstag demands the initiation of immediate peace negotiations upon the foundation of this program. It demands an international agreement about general disarmament, freedom of international trade and intercourse unrestricted international freedom of movement, an international agreement for the protection of workmen from exploitation, recognition of the equal rights of a State without regard to nationality, sex, race, language, and religion; protection of national minorities, and obligatory international arbitration for the settlement of all disputes.

The urgent preliminary condition for the achievement of peace and the carrying out of this peace program is the immediate raising of the state of siege. Moreover, it is necessary to effect the complete democratization of the constitution and administration of the Empire and its several States, and this must end in the creation of a social republic.

Herr Scheidemann, leader of the Social Democrats, on August 7, at Monheim, demanded a government really representing the will of the German people, and said:

But that is still not enough When the Reichstag met we said, "This thing has got to go further. We want democratization; we want a clear declaration on the question of our war aims."

The Reichstag with its peace program has invaded the foreign policy of the Empire and brought about a complete defeat of the annexationists. But now the fight is going on over the decisive influence of the people in Empire and State. We want a State government consistent with the meaning of the suffrage message, and we want an Imperial Government consistent with the meaning of the Reichstag program. Our whole foreign policy must be conducted consistently with this program. And the German press must not be made the instrument of those who would gladly abolish the Reichstag resolution altogether from the world. Press and parliament belong to one another.

It is significant, Mr. President, that the authorities of Germany are now permitting on the interior of Germany an "offensive campaign for peace." It is significant that the proposals of Pope Benedict are immediately approved by Austria, and that the German authorities are indicating their disposition to acquiesce.

But it is also true, Mr. President, that German opinion will be greatly stimulated in favor of peace on the terms of international justice and on the terms which the entente allies will accept if we cohere against the Prussian military autocracy, every nation on earth, which we can do, and do speedily, because they are anxious to establish world-wide liberty to end the terrorism of the Prussian conspiracy.

The proposal of the Reichstag and of the chancellor (Exhibit A) solemnly declare that—

Germany took up arms in defense of its liberty and independence and for the integrity of its territories. The Reichstag labors for peace and a mutual understanding and lasting reconciliation among the nations. Forced acquisitions of territory and political, economic, and financial violations are incompatible with such a peace.

Mr. President, the whole world knows that this statement, while offered as a theory by the Prussian military autocracy to the German people, is utterly false. The Prussian military autocracy took up arms for the purpose of annexation, indemnity, profit, and world domination, and their leaders still confess and declare this to be their plan in spite of the Reichstag resolution to the contrary.

The unfortunate German people were mobilized and sent to the shambles not in defense of German liberty but in unjust offensive war on the liberty of Serbia, France, and Russia; not in defense of German independence but in offensive war on the independence of innocent neighbors; not in defense of the integrity of the territory of Germany but in offensive war on the integrity of the territory of innocent Belgium, Serbia; then France and Russia—the fixed Hohenzollern policy.

But it should not be forgotten, Mr. President, that the majority of the Reichstag represents, in a way, and inadequately, the Social Democrats of Germany, who, with all the limitations on suffrage, had 4,000,000 voters before the war, and the opinion of the German socialist democracy is of importance in determining the opinion of the German people, subjects and vassals though they are. I submit the declared opinion of the German Social Democrats. (Exhibit B.)

The German socialist democracy are, in fact, opposed to annexations of territory by force. They are opposed to war indemnities. They are in favor of restoration of national independence of nations subjected in war, and while they take, naturally, a German view in various particulars, they do favor national disarmament and freedom of the seas, while the minority socialists go to the extreme of democracy. (Exhibit B.) The latter favor a republican Balkan federation of free people, and they seek an international understanding on the basis of democracy. These opinions in Germany ought not to be entirely ignored and these opinions will be immensely strengthened by the activity of the allies on the firing line against the Prussian military autocracy. They will be strengthened by the Germans discovering that the whole world is combined against the Prussian military conspiracy, and that the whole world desires to deal justly by the Teutonic people, as well as to compel the Teutonic powers and people to respect the rights of other people with the same scrupulous decency.

The entente allies, while pressing the battle on the trench lines, should encourage the democratic elements of the Teutonic Empires by giving them assurance of the just purposes of the entente allies, and meet the false dogma of the Pan-German militarists that the entente allies, if victorious, will crush and enslave the Teutonic people.

The opinion of the Russian people is shown by the declaration of the Provisional Government and the councils of workmen and social delegates (Exhibit C) of April 9, 1917, of May 1, 1917, of May 4, 1917, and of June 13, 1917. The Russian Government desires an independent Poland. The Russian Government does not seek annexations or indemnities for free Russia. It strenuously demands, however, that the menace of the Prussian military autocracy shall be ended by military force, and Russia would agree, I hope, to the proposals which I have submitted.

English opinion, I am satisfied, would approve some world arrangement for the speedy coercion of the Prussian military autocracy and would approve a world plan for the maintenance of the future liberties, peace, and happiness of mankind. Mr. Asquith very properly pointed out that the military autocracy possessing the political power of Germany not only did not give its free and full assent to the Reichstag resolutions, limited as they were, but made equivocal comments that left the autocracy open to demand a "German peace" based on German victory, which will not be considered by the entente allies. and he asks the German chancellor plainly a question whether the German Imperial Government is ready to grant Belgium absolute independence and make full reparation for the colossal damage done that devastated country, and he stated with great force that—

> The German Government does not speak for the Reichstag, so the Reichstag itself does not speak for, or at any rate does not give full expression to, the whole view and opinion of the mass of the German people. I believe that to be at this moment one of the greatest obstacles to the attainment of peace. It is one which does not lie within the power of the allies to remove. It lies within the power of the German people. It can not be too clearly, too emphatically, or too often stated this is a matter not for any governments but for the peoples or for the governments only in so far as they can claim to be the authentic spokesmen and interpreters of the peoples for whom they stand. Once that is generally realized throughout the democracies of the world, I believe that we shall be within measureable distance of a lasting and an honorable peace. Meantime we should not be helping the advent of peace if we were to give the impression that there is any halting in our determination or any doubt of our ability to carry on, if need be, the burden which we took up with a clear conscience for great ends and which we can only in honor lay down when we feel sure that those ends are going to be achieved.

Mr. Bonar Law, chancellor of the exchequer, said—

> They tell us that Germany is quite ready for a reasonable peace. Why have the Germans never put down their peace aims in any shape or form? Ours may have gone too far; but at all events, we had the courage to state them before the world. Germany has never done anything of the kind. And why? Because she does not mean what those honorable gentlemean say she means, and because that would be found out the moment any peace terms were put in black and white. * * * We are not only fighting for the freedom of ourselves, though that is the essence of our life; we are fighting for the rights of other nations besides Germany to live their lives in their own way. * * *
> Now I come to what is the real aim so far as this country is concerned in this war. I have thought from the beginning, and I repeat now, that the one thing which we are fighting for is peace, and security, for peace in the time to come.

Mr. President, there is only one way in which to have peace for time to come, and that is to end competitive armaments and the ambitions of military dynasties. This can be done by international government and the substitution of international police in lieu of competing armaments and in no other way.

Mr. President, the fact that Pope Benedict proposes "simultaneous and reciprocal diminution of armaments" with the approval of Austria and apparently with the approval of the German Imperial Government, seems to promise that even the Teutonic autocracy is coming to its senses.

We will help them to reach a condition of sanity by multiplying our war efforts and by coordinating every nation in the world in this struggle against the world domination of the Teutonic powers.

With the end of competitive armaments, the Teutonic military dynasties would have no important function; they would have no real power. The Teutonic peoples would then control their own governments.

There would be no demand then for vassal States, with their subject rifles and economic resources. The German people would then have no need for the iron mines of Alsace-Lorraine for war-making purposes, but the iron ores of Alsace-Lorraine would be equally available for the German factories, the French factories, or any other factories in Europe. The whole "doctrine of balance of power" would be ended in Europe because the balance of power would not be then weighed in the scales between one alliance and an opposing alliance, between Teutonic alliance and entente alliance. The balance of power would be transferred to an international council of sovereign States in the interest of every nation in the world. There would no longer be any reason why there should not be organized republican States in the Balkans, where each people speaking a common language could enjoy their own development and own self-government in harmonious relations with others.

The struggle over the Italia Iridenta would end, and Austria, who offered the Government of Italia Iridenta to Italy before the war, would have no reason whatever for then refusing this point under such favorable circumstances. The suspicions and jealousies which have existed heretofore between the nations would disappear before the establishment of progressive disarmament and the establishment of international police.

Mr. President, Mr. Bonar Law very wisely said that there was a great difference between the German people and the German Government, and when he said:

> We shall not have peace in the time to come unless the German people are convinced that war does not pay, that their greatness and development must be found in other directions and not in plunging the world into war.

Mr. President, I think the German people will ultimately be satisfied that war does not pay. I earnestly hope that they may soon be satisfied on this point. I hope so for the sake of the youth of Europe, as well as for the sake of the youth of America, and of the nations of the earth now at war with the Imperial German Government. This end will be more speedily attained when the German people see that all the nations of the world are organized to end the military autocracy that has led the German people into this bloody conflict. The Germans will get no profit, but severe losses in men and property, which daily grows more fatal to her interests.

Mr. President, on May 27, 1916, President Wilson, after the issuance of the ultimatum to the Imperial German Government, said:

> We believe these fundamental things:
> First. That every people has a right to choose the sovereignty under which they shall live. Like other nations, we have ourselves no doubt once and again offended against that principle when for a little while controlled by selfish passion, as our franker historians have been honorable enough to admit; but it has become more and more our rule of life and action.
> Second. That the small States of the world have a right to enjoy the same respect for their sovereignty and for their territorial integrity that great and powerful nations expect and insist upon; and
> Third. That the world has a right to be free from every disturbance of its peace that has its origin in aggression and disregard of the rights of peoples and nations.
> So sincerely do we believe in these things that I am sure that I speak the mind and wish of the people of America when I say that the United States is willing to become a partner in any feasible association of nations formed in order to realize these objects and make them secure against violation.
> There is nothing that the United States wants for itself that any other nation has. We are willing, on the contrary, to limit ourselves along with them to a prescribed course of duty and respect for the rights of others which will check any selfish passion of our own, as it will check any aggressive impulse of theirs.

On May 30, 1916, President Wilson stated at Arlington National Cemetery:

> I have stated that I believe that the people of the United States are ready to become partners in an alliance of the nations that would guarantee public right above selfish aggression. Some of the public prints have reminded me, as I needed to be reminded, of what Gen. Washington warned us against. He warned us against entangling alliances.
> I shall never myself consent to an entangling alliance, but would gladly assent to a disentangling alliance, an alliance which would disentangle the people of the world from those combinations in which they seek their own separate and private interests and unite the people of the world to preserve the peace of the world upon a basis of common right and justice. There is liberty there, not limitation. There is freedom, not entanglement. There is achievement of the highest things for which the United States has declared its principles.

Mr. President, the program I have outlined is thus shown to be in substantial accord with the views of the President of the United States. I want to call your attention to what he said in his address to the Senate on January 19, 1917:

> No peace can last or ought to last which does not recognize and accept the principle that governments derive all their just powers from the consent of the governed, and that no right anywhere exists to hand peoples about from sovereignty to sovereignty as if they were property. * * * The world can be at peace only if its life is stable, and there can be no stability where the will is in rebellion, where there is not tranquillity of spirit and a sense of justice, of freedom, and of right. * * *
> There can be no sense of safety and equality among the nations if great preponderating armaments are henceforth to continue here and there to be built up and maintained. The statesmen of the world must plan for peace and nations must adjust and accommodate their policy to it as they have planned for war and made ready for pitiless contest and rivalry. The question of armaments, whether on land or sea, is the most immediately and intensely practical question connected with the future fortunes of nations and of mankind. * * *

Let us plan for peace, Mr. President, by disarming on sensible lines.

The President said further:

I would fain believe that I am speaking for the silent mass of mankind everywhere who have as yet had no place or opportunity to speak their real hearts out concerning the death and ruin they see to have come already upon the persons and the homes they hold most dear. * * *

No nation should seek to extend its polity over any other nation or people, but that every people should be left free to determine its own polity, its own way of development, unhindered, unthreatened, unafraid, the little along with the great and powerful. * * * There is no entangling alliance in a concert of power. When all unite to act in the same sense and with the same purpose all act in the common interest and are free to live their own lives under a common protection.

I am proposing government by the consent of the governed; that freedom of the seas which in international conference after conference representatives of the United States have urged with the eloquence of those who are the convinced disciples of liberty; and that moderation of armaments which makes of armies and navies a power for order merely, not an instrument of aggression or of selfish violence. These are American principles, American policies.

All these principles are involved in Senate joint resolution 94.

Mr. President, the Democratic platform of 1916 voiced these American principles, and the Republicans believe the same doctrine:

We hold that it is the duty of the United States to use its power not only to make itself safe at home but also to make secure its just interests throughout the world, and both for this end and in the interest of humanity to assist the world in securing settled peace and justice.

We believe that every people has the right to choose the sovereignty under which it shall live (government with the consent of the governed); that the small states of the world have the right to enjoy from other nations the same respect for their sovereignty and for their territorial integrity that great and powerful nations expect and insist upon; that the world has a right to be free from every disturbance of its peace that has its origin in aggression or disregard of the rights of peoples and nations; and we believe that the time has come when it is the duty of the United States to join with the other nations of the world in any feasible association that will effectively serve these principles and maintain inviolate the complete security of the highways of the seas for the common unhindered use of all nations.

Mr. Lloyd-George, who is the exponent of English opinion, at Glasgow, June 29, 1917, struck the keynote when he pointed out the necessity, in obtaining permanent world peace, of ending military autocracies. He said:

What will have to be guaranteed first of all by the conditions of peace is that they shall be framed upon so equitable a basis that nations will not wish to disturb them. They must be guaranteed by the destruction of the Prussian military power, that the confidence of the German people shall be in the equity of their cause and not in the might of their arms. May I say that a better guaranty than either would have been the democratization of the German Government. * * *

No one wishes to dictate to the German people the forms of government under which they choose to live. That is a matter entirely for themselves, but it is right we should say we could enter into negotiations with a free government in Germany with a different attitude of mind, a different temper, a different spirit, with less suspicion, with more confidence than we could with a Government whom we knew to be dominated by the aggressive and arrogant spirit of Prussian militarism.

Mr. President, the destruction of Prussian militarism may come in one of three ways—first, by consent of the military leaders before physical destruction comes; second, by the will of the German people before physical ruin ensues; third, by the physical force of the military powers of the entente allies.

The third means will be more costly in life to all nations, but will be applied if necessary, and is in very active operation at this time.

Lloyd-George well said:

Now we are faced with the greatest and grimmest struggle of all—liberty, equality, fraternity not amongst men but amongst nations; great, yea small; powerful, yea weak; exalted, yea humblest; Germany, yea Belgium; Austria, yea Serbia—equality, fraternity amongst peoples as well as amongst men. That is the challenge which has been thrown to us. Europe is again drenched with the blood of its bravest and best, but do not forget these are the great successions of hallowed causes. They are the stations of the cross on the road to the emancipation of mankind. Let us endure as our fathers did. Every birth is an agony, and the new world is born out of the agony of the old world.

My appeal to the people of this country, and, if my appeal can reach beyond, it is this:

That we should continue to fight for the great good of international right and international justice, so that never again shall brute force sit on the throne of justice nor barbaric strength wield the scepter of right.

Mr. President, only by international government, backed by international force, is this ideal possible; only by terminating competing armaments and substituting therefor international cooperating armaments shall we see this great prayer adequately answered. Public opinion in the United States would assuredly approve permanent world peace on the basis proposed by Senate joint resolution 94.

The plan is essential—absolutely essential—to attain the ideal of permanent world peace and the overthrow of progressive militarism, so ardently desired by the statesmen of the entente allies.

Mr. President, we already have 17 nations waging this war in concert. We already have 17 nations allied together for the suppression of the Prussian autocracy. We already have nations representing three-fourths of the people of the world allied together for the purpose of crushing the menace to the liberties of the world of Prussian militarism. These nations ought to have their representatives meeting around a table for common action, declaring a common policy, and not compelled to carry on an interchange of views at variable distances of thousands of miles which circle the earth from China to the United States, from Japan to London. We ought to get together in common concert, in a common understanding as to international rules to safeguard our future relations toward each other and toward the common enemy. What sound argument can be urged against it? It is not an entangling alliance; it is what President Wilson very appropriately called a "disentangling alliance." An alliance with one of two military groups contending for greater power would be an entangling alliance. An alliance with all the nations of the world to prevent any nation or group of nations threatening the world is a disentangling alliance, which we ought to establish as speedily as possible.

Mr. President and Senators, I have submitted the proposal. I pray it may be considered thoughtfully by you and by the thinking men of all nations.

Improve upon it, perfect it, but act; act at once, while the iron is hot to hammer in shape the links which shall bind us to other nations in bonds of fraternity, liberty, equality, and guarantee to all mankind, including the Teutonic people, perpetual prosperity and happiness.

APPENDIX.

EXHIBIT A.

REICHSTAG'S PEACE PLANK CALLS FOR RECONCILIATION; ANNEXATIONS ARE OPPOSED.

The peace resolution of the majority bloc adopted Thursday by the Reichstag, as given in the Tageblatt of Berlin last week is as follows:

"As on August 4, 1914, so on the threshhold of the fourth year of the war the German people stand up on the assurance of the speech from the throne, 'We are driven by no lust of conquest.'

"Germany took up arms in defense of its liberty and independence and for the integrity of its territories. The Reichstag labors for peace and a mutual understanding and lasting reconciliation among the nations. Forced acquisitions of territory and political, economic, and financial violations are incompatible with such a peace.

"The Reichstag rejects all plans aiming at an economic blockade and the stirring up of enmity among the peoples after the war. The freedom of the seas must be assured. Only an economic peace can prepare the ground for the friendly association of the peoples.

"The Reichstag will energetically promote the creation of international juridical organizations. So long, however, as the enemy governments do not accept such a peace, so long as they threaten Germany and her allies with conquest and violation, the German people will stand together as one man, hold out unshaken, and fight until the rights of itself and its allies to life and development are secured. The German Nation united is unconquerable.

"The Reichstag knows that in this announcement it is as one with the men who are defending the Fatherland. In the heroic struggles they are sure of the undying thanks of the whole people."

POINTS MADE BY CHANCELLOR.

"The burning question in our hearts is how much longer the war is to last. With this I come to a matter which stands in the center of all our interest and all our proceedings to-day. Germany did not desire the war in order to make violent conquests, and therefore will not continue the war a day longer merely for the sake of such conquests if it can obtain an honorable peace.

"Germans wish to make peace as combatants who have accomplished their purpose and proved themselves invincible.

"One condition of peace must be the inviolability of German territory. No parley is possible with the enemy demanding cession of German soil.

"We must by means of understanding and in a spirit of give and take guarantee conditions of the existence of the German Empire upon the Continent and overseas."

"Peace must offer the foundation of a lasting reconciliation of nations. It must provide a safeguard that the league in the arms of our opponents does not develop into an economic offensive alliance against us.

"These aims may be attained within the limits of your resolution, as I interpret it. [The Reichstag peace resolution.] We can not again offer peace. We have loyally stretched out our hand once. It met no response, but with the entire nation and with the German Army and its leaders in accord with this declaration, the Government feels that if our enemies abandon their lust for conquest and their aims at subjugation, and wish to enter into negotiations we shall listen honestly and ready fo. peace to what they have to say to us. Until then we must hold out calmly and patiently.

"I declare, in fact, that the submarine war accomplishes in the destruction of enemy tonnage what it should. It impairs England's economic life and the conduct of the war month to month in a growing degree, so that it will not be possible to oppose the necessity for peace much longer. We can look forward to the further labors of the brave submarine with complete confidence."

EXHIBIT B.

1.

The German Socialist Democracy aspires to a peace based upon mutual understanding and demands guarantees for the freedom of political, economical, and cultural development of its own nation. It also disapproves all violence against the vital interests of other peoples. Only such a peace can bring with it guarantees of durability. It alone will allow the nations to triumph over an atmosphere of hostility and to place all their strength in the service of social betterment and the progress of civilization.

Starting out from this general viewpoint we have given our assent to the project of the Workmen's and Soldiers' Council of Petrograd in view of a peace without annexations or indemnities on the basis of the right of peoples freely to dispose of themselves. Consequently our attitude toward the particular points of the questionnaire is as follows:

I. Annexations.

We are opposed to annexations of territory by force. As far as the modification of frontiers on the basis of a mutual understanding is concerned the people interested, when they desire to remain in their old government, must be assured regarding all judicial and economic possibilities connected with changing their residence. It is understood the rejection of all forced annexations also covers the restitution of invaded colonies.

II. War indemnities.

The imposition of war indemnities has been rejected. It could not be realized otherwise than by totally crushing one of the belligerents. But each day of continued struggle increases so much the sum of sacrifices in wealth and blood for both sides that, merely for that motive, it would be inadmissible to retard peace for the sake of obtaining indemnities. Otherwise, the economic oppression of one nation by another would make a durable peace impossible.

III. Restorations.

In so far as this question applies to political restoration—that is, to the reestablishment of national independence—our answer is in the affirmative. On the contrary, we reject the idea of one-sided obligations to repair damages in territories affected by the war. These damages have resulted on all fronts from acts of hostile as well as friendly troops advancing or in retreat. Sometimes they were the immediate results of gunfire, at other times they were measures taken for military safety.

It appears to us extremely difficult to determine the origin of each damage case and to examine military justification. An obligation binding on one side only to repair damages would be nothing less than a disguised form of war indemnity.

For States ruined by the war, which would be unable to reestablish by themselves their economic life, international financial assistance could be provided on the basis of mutual understanding.

Besides, we Socialists consider the destruction of private property only the least part of the damages produced. The greatest losses affecting humanity—the destruction of human life—can be repaired by no amount of effort and future human happiness.

IV. The right of nations to dispose of themselves.

By the right of peoples to maintain or to modify their conditions, we mean political independence.

The first States to be considered are those which, like Belgium, Serbia, and other Balkan States, have lost their independence in this war. We are in favor of the reestablishment of an independent Belgium. Belgium ought not to be a vassal State of Germany, of England, or of France.

As regards Serbia and the Balkan States, we refer the matter to what has been said by our Austrian comrades.

A second group, in reference to which the question of the right of nations to dispose of themselves comes up, is formed by peoples who lost their independence long ago, but who consider themselves freed from foreign domination by the events of the war. This applies to Poland of the times of the Congress of Vienna, and to Finland. They can not be denied the right to dispose of themselves.

Other allogeneous territories, in so far as there is no question of the independence of a State, ought to have guaranteed to them at least autonomy sufficient to cover the development of their own national life.

A third group is composed of peoples formerly independent, of a higher civilization, which became the prey of imperialistic domination, but the political rights of which have undergone no changes during the present war. To this group belong Ireland, Egypt, Tripoli, Morocco, India, Thibet, Korea, and other countries, which once were independent States.

The German Socialist Democracy feels the greatest sympathy with the efforts of all these peoples to recover their national liberty and would be pleased if the socialists in the States which dominate those countries would raise their voices so that the oppressed nations might be freed from the yoke of foreign domination.

V. Autonomy of nationalities.

In regard to cultural autonomy of portions of populations speaking other languages than that of the larger State into which they were incorporated, the German Socialist Democracy, in accordance with the attitude it has hitherto held, insists on the greatest extension of that autonomy in the future.

The German Empire will have to consider the demands of our Danish, Polish, and French fellow citizens in Schleswig on the north, in Poland and eastern Prussia, as well as in Alsace-Lorraine.

We most rigorously condemn every attack made against the use of the mother tongue and all hindrances to the exercise of what constitutes the character and the particular national civilization of those nations.

The portions of allogeneous nations bordering on the territories of a State ought not to form obstacles to friendly relations, but rather serve as bridges for a mutual understanding between one people and another, one civilization and another. The introduction of truly democratic conceptions in all countries would make possible the realization of this aim.

Regarding the situation of the different nationalities in Austria-Hungary, we refer their case to the statements made by our Austrian comrades.

VI. Alsace-Lorraine.

In regard to Alsace-Lorraine, which was counted in the questionnaire among the "nationalities," it must be said first of all that Alsace-Lorraine has never been an independent national State, and that, besides, it could not be considered a particular nationality. According to its ethnographic nature—that is, according to its race and language—the population of Alsace-Lorraine is nearly nine-tenths German. French as a mother tongue is spoken by no more than 11.4 per cent of the population.

Besides, Alsace-Lorraine is not a territory which has changed hands during the war; it has remained, all except a very narrow band near the frontier, under the dominion of the German State. It would be impossible, then, from this point of view, to open the question of annexing Alsace-Lorraine to this or that State.

The territories of Alsace-Lorraine, which originally, both politically and ethnographically, belonged to Germany, had been wrested by France from the German Empire together with other territories. By the peace of Frankfurt, in 1871, they resumed their original status. Consequently it is almost unjustified to speak of an historical right of France to these territories. To force the restitution of Alsace-Lorraine would amount to nothing less than annexation on the part of France, an annexation of territory where a foreign language is spoken. The Socialist Democracy demands for Alsace-Lorraine the guaranty of a complete equality of rights as a confederate independent State in the German Empire and a free democratic constitution providing for its legislation and interior administration. The German Socialist Democracy made that statement at the congress of Jena in 1913, in a resolution presented by comrades from Alsace-Lorraine. This settlement of the question, granting to Alsace-Lorraine equality of rights in the confederation and extensive interior autonomy, was in accord with the views of our comrades of the French Socialist Party before the war. Besides it answers the wish expressed on several occasions and even recently manifested by the national representatives of Alsace-Lorraine, who art elected by universal, equal, direct, and secret suffrage.

The principle of peace without annexations naturally does not exclude friendly agreements on the question of modifying frontiers.

FUNDAMENTAL ELEMENTS OF INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS.

Taking into account the vital legitimate interests of all peoples, the right of each people to political independence and to freedom of economic development can not be permanently guaranteed unless the future treaty of peace contains a general outline of the rights of men. The work of years of peace will be required to build up internationally on common principles, political law, labor law, civil law, and commercial law, aiming to create among the peoples a community of judicial and economic civilization.

1. Provision for the rights of men.

The aim for a world peace guaranteed by judicial international institutions is considered the highest moral obligation according to the principles formulated on August 16, 1915, by the national council and a fraction of the German Socialist Party.

In accordance with the resolutions of the International Socialist Congress at Copenhagen, we particularly demand in the treaty of peace:

(a) The recognition of an international court of arbitration, to which all disputes between States shall be submitted;

(b) A superior judicial organization for each State, to be created for the prevention of the violation of contracts established by human law.

II. Disarmament and freedom of the seas.

In the treaties of peace mention will have to be made of arrangements for the limitation of armaments on land and sea. The aim of these arrangements ought to be to create a popular armed force for the defense of territories against warlike aggressions and strong oppression. The period of service in each of these categories of armies ought to be reduced to a minimum.

The legitimate means of carrying on war ought to be limited by contract. The ammunition industry ought to be nationalized. The supplying of arms and munitions by neutral nations to belligerents ought to be forbidden internationally. The right of capture on the sea ought to be suppressed. The arming of commercial vessels ought to be forbidden. All straits which are important for world relations and all interoceanic canals ought to be under international control.

Efficacious guarantees must be made for the safety of world commerce during war. The nature of contraband ought to be internationally defined. All clothing and food materials ought to be banished from the lists of war contraband. Private property ought to be protected against the encroachments of belligerents. Postal relations between belligerents and neutrals, and between neutrals likewise ought to be guaranteed in times of war. The matter of blockade ought to be defined anew.

III. Economic and social political questions.

In order that the fraternizing of peoples may not be hindered, it will be necessary in the treaties of peace to include clauses guaranteeing against a continued war in the form of an economic war.

The freedom of communication by land and sea ought to be reestablished in the treaties of peace.

The system of protective laws ought to be entirely done away with. The aim of all commercial politics ought to be based on the suppression of customs duties and commercial barriers.

In the colonies the "open-gate" system—that is, the right of all peoples to economic activity—ought to be established.

The freedom of international circulation, the right of coalition, the protection of labor, workingmen's insurance, the protection of working women and children, and home work ought to be regulated according to the well-known program of the International Federation of Syndicates.

IV. The suppression of secret diplomacy.

We demand that all treaties between States and all international agreements be submitted to the democratic control of national represenatives.

THE PRACTICAL REALIZATION OF THESE AIMS.

Commissions for the study of various problems would furnish valuable explanations in regard to national and economic questions. The main problem, however, for international socialism is to bring about peace as soon as possible. And peace, we are convinced, can be obtained by mutual agreement on the basis of "no annexations and no indemnities" even before the commissions begin their work.

THE ACTIVITY OF THE INTERNATIONALE.

Neutral countries have been, without exception, more or less interested in the war. All have an interest in an early peace. Consequently it is necessary to summon them to regulate economic, social, and judicial questions of an international character.

The other questions concerning the collaboration of the internationale during peace negotiations have already received a sufficient reply.

As far as the Socialist parties in belligerent countries are concerned, their influence on the governments, national representatives, and official peace conference ought to become stronger every day.

ACTIVITIES OF SOCIALIST PARTIES FOR PEACE.

We are coming now to the question of motives which led the German delegation to ask, on the 7th day of June, that a report of each delegation on the work of its party, in view of a permanent peace, be added to the questionnaire.

The bureau of the Social Democratic Party in Germany issued two pamphlets containing a collection of statements, manifestoes, and discourses delivered in the Reichstag, in which the attitude of the party in regard to war and war aims is explained.

In this collection of documents proof is furnished that the German Social Democratic Party has worked from the first day of the war for an early peace, and that it knows no other conditions for a peace agreement than the fact that the adversaries are equally ready for such a peace.

But the German Social Democratic Party is not satisfied, in its work for peace, with more parliamentary discourses, manifestoes, and statements cited in the above-mentioned collection. It has held meetings for peace in all parts of the Empire and obtained signatures to petitions in which the Government was asked to declare its readiness for peace under the condition of renouncing all plans of conquest.

This work for peace has had a great measure of success. Unfortunately, the endeavors of the Social Democratic Party of Germany to renew the ties of friendship with the Socialist Parties in Germany and France have remained unsuccessful.

The work for peace can bring no favorable results unless it be undertaken simultaneously on both sides. This, we believe, could have been done and should have been done long ago, without necessitating either party's having to ask for something resembling the abandonment of the national cause

We declare to all nations that we have no other obligation than that of defending our own Nation, and no mission to punish other peoples for the imaginary or real crimes of their governments. It is in this sense that the German Social Democratic Party has not ceased to work.

GENERAL SOCIALIST CONFERENCE.

We are ready to participate without reserve in a general Socialist conference for peace, because we believe the first duty of all Socialists is to act for peace. An explanation of the attitude of all Socialist parties would be simplified if all of them would prepare a collection of documents regarding their activities in favor of peace.

In regard to the explanation of responsibilities, from which we can not escape, we believe such a statement would not facilitate the attainment of the aim of the conference. There is no need of discussing the past; what we ought to do is to come to an understanding in reference to the future, namely, in reference to the realization of a permanent peace in accordance with our principles and our ideals.

We have no objection to the participation of all minority Socialists at the general conference.

MEMORANDUM OF THE MINORITY SOCIALISTS.

In its peace views, as in its general policy, the German Independent Social Democratic Party proceeds from the common interests of the international proletariat and the development of society. These interests demand immediate peace.

In the peace to be concluded we demand an international arrangement for general disarmament as being the chief means of strengthening the debilitated States. General disarmament is the only way to break any militarist supremacy and to secure a lasting and peaceful understanding between the nations.

We demand the fullest freedom for international trade and intercourse, as well as an unlimited right of migration. We condemn any economic barriers or any economic struggle between States.

All disputes between States must be settled by compulsory international arbitration.

We demand international treaties to secure the workers against impoverishment, especially in regard to women and children.

Political rights for women we regard as a social necessity.

Equal rights should be granted for all the inhabitants of any country, without regard to tongue, race, or religion. This would also mean the securing to national minorities the right to develop their national life.

National and social liberation can not be achieved by the Governments at war. It can only be done by democracy.

Democratic control of foreign policy will prevent aggressive measures. Secret treaties must be abolished, and all State treaties must be made dependent upon the assent of the parliaments.

Though not regarding State boundaries as inviolable, we condemn the war and its prolongation as a means of regulating boundaries. Regulation of frontiers must be conditional upon the assent of the populations concerned and not an act of force.

With all firmness we object to the violation in any form of any nation.

From the beginning of the war we have consistently demanded peace without annexations or indemnities, based upon national self-government.

It is not our affair to draw up a program covering all the questions to be dealt with in the peace settlement, but in regard to the questions raised in the discussions now going on we declare the following:

The reestablishment of Serbia as a self-governing, independent State is our absolute demand.

The needs of a republican Balkan federation.

The uniting of all Serbs in a single national State, and its combination with the other Balkan States in a republican Balkan federation we regard as the best way of removing the eastern question as a cause of war.

We understand the deep feeling of the Poles for national unity. To admit the right of Russian Poland to national independence but to deny that same right to Prussian and Austrian Poland is contradictory.

Just as with Serbia and Poland, so do we condemn the prolongation of the war as a means of settling the question of Alsace-Lorraine. The population of Alsace-Lorraine, which in 1871 was annexed against its will, will not obtain peace any earlier than it will itself obtain the opportunity through a direct and free vote to express its wish as to the State to which it shall belong. The German people would obtain by this mode of settlement an economic, political, and moral gain that would be greater than any possible loss, even if the voting gave another result than it had anticipated.

The full independence and economic self-dependence (i. e., freedom from economic interference of Belgium is inevitable. In fulfillment of the German Government's promise at the beginning of the war, the Belgian nation has to be compensated for the damage caused by the war, and especially for the economic values that have been taken away. Such a repayment has nothing to do with the various kinds of indemnities, which simply mean the plundering of the vanquished by the victor, and which we therefore reject.

As opponents of any policy of conquest and foreign dominion we reject, as we have always done, a policy of colonial conquest. The possession of any colony without its own self-administration is nothing else than the possession of an unfree people and, just as slavery, is incompatible with our principles.

Neither by the acquirement of colonies nor by a change of possessor is the population's right to self-determination respected. The possession of colonies, too, is not necessary for industrial development.

THE NEED FOR A COMMON PROGRAM.

Only if the Internationale is erected, independent and powerful; if the proletariat everywhere lend it its full force through keeping control over governments and maintaining peace, only then will there come in the future a state of mutual confidence between the nations instead of an armaments contest.

The proletariat in every country must now do its all to bring the war to an end. To attain this aim the independence of the Socialist parties in relation to their imperial governments must be presupposed.

The drawing up of a common peace program is important, but this program has no worth if it is not supported by the energetic international action of the masses. Every government must be challenged to give its unconditional adhesion to the international peace program.

Credits are to be refused to any government that refuses this program or answers evasively or does not declare itself ready to enter upon peace conversations on the basis of this program. Such government must be fought in the sharpest manner.

To undertake and further such common peace action must be the first object of the planned international peace conference. A proletariat organization that will not join in this action would thereby forfeit the right henceforth to be regarded as an organization of international socialism.

RUSSIA.

[Documents issued by the Provisional Government and the Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates relative to terms of peace, Apr. 9–June 13, 1917.]

Proclamation issued by the Provisional Government, April 9, 1917.

Having examined the military situation the Russian Government, in the name of duty and country, has decided to tell the people directly and openly the whole truth.

The régime which now has been overthrown left the defense of the country in badly disorganized condition. By its culpable inaction and its inept measures it introduced disorganization into our finances, into provisioning, and the transport and supply of munitions to the army. It weakened the whole of our economic organization.

The Provisional Government with the active cooperation of the whole nation will devote all its energies to repair the serious consequences of the old régime. The blood of many sons of the fatherland has been shed freely in the course of these two and a half long years of war, but the country still is capable of a powerful blow at the enemy, who occupies whole territories of our State and is now—in the days of the birth of Russian liberty—threatening us with a new and decisive thrust.

The defense, cost what it may of our national patrimony, and the deliverance of the country from the enemy who invades our borders constitute the capital and the vital problem before our warriors, who are defending the liberty of the people in close union with our allies.

The Government deems it to be its right duty to declare now that free Russia does not aim at the domination of other nations, at depriving them of their national patrimony, or at occupying by force foreign territories, but that its object is to establish a durable peace on the rights of nations to decide their own destiny.

The Russian nation does not lust after the strengthening of its power abroad at the expense of other nations. Its aim is not to subjugate or humiliate anyone. In the name of the higher principles of equity it has removed the chains which weighed upon the Polish people. But the Russian nation will not allow its fatherland to come out of the great struggle humiliated and weakened in its vital forces. These principles will constitute the basis of the foreign policy of the provisional government, which will carry out unfailingly the popular will and safeguard the rights of our fatherland, while observing the engagements entered into with our allies.

The provisional government of free Russia has no right to hide the truth. The State is in danger. Every effort must be made to have it let the country respond to the truth when it is told, not by sterile depressions and not by discouragement, but by unanimous vigor, with a view to creating a united national will.

This will give us new strength for the struggle and will procure our salvation. In this hour of rude trial let the whole country find in itself strength to consolidate the liberty won and to devote itself to untiring labor for the welfare of free Russia.

The Provisional Government, which has given its solemn oath to serve the people, is firmly confident that with the general and unanimous support of each one and all it will itself be able to do its duty to its country to the end.

LVOFF,
President of the Council.

Note sent by the minister of foreign affairs to the Russian diplomatic representatives in the allied countries May 1, 1917.

Please hand to the Government to which you are accredited the following note:

The Provisional Government of Russia published on April 27 a manifesto to Russian citizens in which it explained the views of the Government of free Russia in regard to the objects to be attained in the war. The minister for foreign affairs instructs me to communicate to you the contents of the document referred to and to add the following considerations:

Our enemies have striven lately to sow discord among our allies by propagating absurd reports regarding the alleged intention of Russia to conclude a separate peace with the central powers. The text of the document annexed will form the best refutation of such inventions. The general principles therein enunciated by the Provisional Government are in entire agreement with the ideas which were repeatedly expressed up to quite recently by eminent statesmen of the allied countries. These principles were also lucidly expressed in the words of the President of our new ally, the great oversea Republic.

The Russian Government under the old régime was certainly not prepared to appreciate and share these ideas as to the liberating character of the war, the establishment of a stable basis for the pacific cooperation of nations, the freedom of oppressed peoples, etc. But emancipated

Russia can now use language which will be understood by modern democracies, and hastens to add her voice to that of her allies.

The declarations of the Provisional Government, being imbued with this new spirit of a free democracy, can not naturally afford the least pretext for the assumption that the demolition of the old structure has entailed any slackening on the part of Russia in the common struggle of all the allies. On the contrary, the nation's determination to bring the world war to a decisive victory has been accentuated owing to the sense of responsibility which belongs to all in general and to each one of us in particular. This spirit has become still more active by the fact that it is concentrated on the immediate task, which touches everybody so closely, of driving back the enemy who has invaded our territory. It is understood, and the annexed document expressly states so, that the Provisional Government in safeguarding the rights acquired for our country will maintain strict regard for the engagements entered into with the allies of Russia.

Firmly convinced of a victorious issue to the present war, and in perfect agreement with our allies, the Provisional Government is likewise confident that the problems which were created by this war will be solved by the creation on a firm basis of a lasting peace, and that, inspired by identical sentiments, the allied democracies will find a means of establishing the guaranties and penalties necessary to prevent any recourse to a sanguinary war in the future.

Explanation of the note of May 1, 1917, presented to the Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates May 4, 1917.

The note was subjected to long and detailed examination by the provisional government and was unanimously approved. It was obvious that this note, in speaking of a decisive victory, had in view a solution of the problems which were mentioned in the communication of April 9 and which was thus specified:

"The Government deems it to be its right and duty to declare now that free Russia does not aim at the domination of other nations or at depriving them of their national patrimony or at occupying by force foreign territories, but that its object is to establish a durable peace on the basis of the rights of nations to decide their own destiny.

"The Russian nation does not lust after the strengthening of its power abroad at the expense of other nations. Its aim is not to subjugate or humiliate anyone. In the name of the higher principles of equity the Russian people have broken the chains which fettered the Polish nation, but it will not suffer that its own country shall emerge from the great struggle humiliated or weakened in its vital forces."

In referring to the "penalties and guaranties" essential to a durable peace the provisional government had in view the reduction of armaments, the establishment of international tribunals, etc.

This explanation will be communicated by the minister of foreign affairs to the ambassadors of the allied powers.

Statement issued by the Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates May 4, 1917.

The note of the minister for foreign affairs of May 1 (published on May 3), to which was attached for transmission to the governments of the allies the provisional government's declaration of April 9, evoked the disapproval of the executive committee of the Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates and a vigorous protest from the democracy, which took the form of meetings and mass demonstrations. On their side the bourgeois elements also began agitating, protesting against the said demonstrations of workmen and soldiers. The next day the movement spread to Moscow.

On the night of May 4 a joint sitting was held by the executive committee of the Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates, the Government, and the executive committee of the Duma. On the same day the provisional government communicated to the executive committee a supplementary note to be addressed to the ambassadors of the allied powers (published on May 5), declaring that the Government understood by the words "decisive victory" the renunciation by Russia of territorial conquests and the seizure of national property of other nations and of all extension of Russia's power at the expense of other States. In view of this supplementary note the Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates adopted the following resolution proposed by the executive committee:

The Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates warmly congratulates the revolutionary democracy of Petrograd, whose meetings, resolutions, and demonstrations have shown the close attention it pays to questions of foreign policy and its anxiety that that policy should not wander off in the direction of the usurping imperialism of the old régime. The note of the minister for foreign affairs of May 1 did indeed offer good ground for the above anxiety. The Provisional Government had taken a step which the executive committee had long urged and had communicated to the Governments of the allies the text of its declaration of April 9 announcing its renunciation of any policy of conquest. By that act the Government placed upon the allied States the necessity of stating their attitude on the policy of conquest and the general aims of the war before their respective democracies and before those of the whole world.

The note of the minister for foreign affairs, however, sent to the Governments of the allies, attached to the Government's declaration of April 9 explanations so worded that they could be understood as an attempt to minimize the real importance of the step taken. The terms and formulæ of the note, borrowed from the vocabulary of the diplomacy of the old régime and incomprehensible to the people, were of such a nature as to give rise to a justifiable fear that, in the domain of international relations, the Provisional Government did indeed intend to depart from the path of the renunciation of the policy of conquests which it had proclaimed on April 9. The unanimous protests of the workmen and soldiers of Petrograd showed the Provisional Government and all the peoples of the world that the revolutionary democracy of Russia would never consent to the setting up anew of the problems and processes of the foreign policy of the epoch of the czars and that its efforts are and will be directed to an implacable struggle for a world peace.

The Government's fresh explanations, called forth by these protests, brought to the knowledge of the public and communicated by the minister for foreign affairs to the ambassadors of the allied powers, put an end to all interpretations of the note in a sense contrary to the interests and demands of revolutionary democracy.

The report in the New York Times of May 6, 1917, states that the resolution concluded:

"The executive committee, while asserting its unalterable determination not to make peace except on these conditions, appeals to the entire revolutionary democracy of Russia to rally round the Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates, and declares its firm assurance that the peoples of all the belligerent countries will be able to overcome the resistance of their Governments and force them to enter upon negotiations for peace on the basis of renunciation of all annexations and indemnities."

Statement by the Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates, June 13, 1917.

The Russian revolution, which is a revolt of the people not only against the tyranny of Czarism but also against the horrors of the world war, the blame for which falls upon international imperialism, has placed before all countries with extraordinary acuteness the urgent need of concluding peace.

At the same time the Russian revolution has indicated to the nations a way for realizing this problem, notably a union of all the working classes to combat all attempts of imperialism to prolong the war in the interests of the wealthy classes and to prevent peace with annexations or indemnities.

The working classes of all countries can easily come to a speedy, solid agreement only if they are inspired with their own interests and remove the aspirations of imperialists and militarists, who often hide their true face under a seductive mask. It is evident that the conference can become the turning point in the terrible epoch of fratricidal war only if the members of the conferences are imbued with these ideas. And it is no less evident that all the questions you have raised can not be the subject of discord or a motive for a continuation of the war.

Having recognized the right of nations to dispose of their destiny, the members of the conference will come to an understanding without difficulty regarding the future of Alsace-Lorraine and other regions. Moreover, the working classes, relieved of the mutual distrust with which the imperialists have envenomed them, will agree regarding the means of granting compensation and the amount of such compensation to the countries devastated by war, like Belgium, Poland, Galicia, and Serbia. But it goes without saying that such compensation must have nothing in common with the contribution which is imposed on the conquered country.

Regarding your statement that it is impossible for you to break the secret union, this statement evidently is based on a misunderstanding, for the Council of the Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates claims from no party as a preliminary condition the renunciation of the policy already pursued by it. The council expects from the conference of the Socialists of the belligerent and neutral countries the creation of an internationale, which will permit all the working classes of the whole world to struggle in concert for a general peace and break the bonds which unite them by force to the governments and the classes imbued with imperialistic tendencies which prevent peace.

The Council of the Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates also considers it futile for parties to make it an absolute condition of their taking part in the conference that the preliminary consent of other parties shall be obtained to any obligatory decision, for that would give rise to irreconcilable contradictions on questions an amicable discussion of which might lead to a solution acceptable to both parties.

Regarding your desire to obtain a previous complete agreement between the allied Socialists, the way in which we put the problem renders futile any such understanding. We consider that the conference can succeed only if the Socialists consider themselves, not the representatives of the two belligerent parties, but representatives of a single movement of the working classes toward a common aim of a general peace.

EXHIBIT D.

I. THE ORIGINS OF PRUSSIA.

When in 1415 the Holy Roman Emperor Sigismund of Luxemburg sold the Electorate of Brandenburg—a war-ridden border mark on the Oder River somewhat larger than the State of Vermont—to the hitherto inconspicuous House of Hohenzollern, he little realized that he was taking the first step toward bringing into being a political organization which, just five centuries later, would have reduced the remnants of his Empire to a state of vassalage and would be contending with a fair prospect of success for the domination of the civilized world. During all of this long period of Prussian expansion it has been uniformly and consistently maintained that a Hohenzollern is accountable for his acts to God alone, and that considerations of private morality have no bearing upon the policy and actions of a state.

The first conspicuous additions to the Hohenzollern holdings came in 1614 and 1618, when, through fortunate family alliances, they obtained control of the duchy of Cleves and Mark (which were formally awarded to Prussia in 1666) and of the Slavic duchy of East Prussia, a fief of the King of Poland. Thus, in 1618, the Hohenzollern family was linked up with the destiny of Prussia.

II. THE FIRST ERA OF PRUSSIAN EXPANSION, 1640–1815.

The first important stage of Prussian development began with Frederick William, the great Elector (1640–1688), who is one of the half dozen great figures in the history of Prussian expansion. Coarse, brutal, unscrupulous, and treacherous, but withal energetic and sagacious, the great Elector, by skillful intrigues and double-faced diplomacy rather than by war, obtained full sovereignty over East Prussia, made secure Prussian control of Pomerania, and added Halberstadt, Minden, and Magdeburg and brought his somewhat scattered domains under the centralized control of his officials at Berlin. He introduced the typical Prussian policy of building up an effective military organization, and, by encouraging the settlement of refugee Huguenots, he brought economic prosperity to Prussia.

In 1701 the head of the Hohenzollern house was able to induce the Emperor Leopold to allow him to assume the royal title in return for aid against Spain, and the Hohenzollerns accordingly became Kings of Prussia.

The next important Prussian ruler was Frederick William I (1713–1640), a true Hohenzollern of the most vigorous type, who held that a paternal despotism was the ideal form of government, and maintained that an efficient State has for its primary purpose the supporting of a large and effective army. He continued the work of the great Elector and perfected the two most typical Prussian institutions by making the army the best disciplined fighting machine in Europe and by establishing the extremely efficient centralized Prussian bureaucracy.

Frederick William added little to Prussian territory, but he handed down to his more famous son, Frederick the Great (1740–1786), the highly organized political and military system which enabled the latter to extend the Prussian domains more than any other ruler to the time of Bismarck. A self-confessed Machiavellian, Frederick's foreign policy was speedily indicated, when, in the first year of his reign, he trumped up the extremely flimsy pretext of a very ancient family claim, summarily invaded the realms of the youthful and helpless Maria Theresa, the Queen of Austria, and seized the Province of Silesia. A few years later he acquired Friesland on the North Sea. In 1756 practically all of Continental Europe united against Frederick, and, but for the aid of England, the Prussian military despotism, which already had begun to threaten the peace of Europe, might have been brought to an early and salutary end. With English support Frederick was able to fight his enemies to a draw and to establish the Hohenzollerns as the peers of the Hapsburgs and the Bourbons. In 1772, Frederick, in conjunction with Russia and Austria, participated in that most shameful international larceny—the first partition of Poland. By selecting as his share of the booty the district of West Prussia he was able to link it up with Brandenburg and East Prussia into a compact geographical unity.

Frederick William II (1786–1797), the successor of Frederick the Great, by two more equally disgraceful partitions of Poland, secured Posen and the adjoining districts and was thus able to round out the gap between Prussia proper and Silesia.

By the terms of the Congress of Vienna, 1815, Prussia secured the rich Rhine Provinces and northern Saxony.

III. THE ORIGIN OF A PRUSSIANIZED GERMAN EMPIRE, 1815–1871.

The task of the Hohenzollerns from 1815 to 1871 was clearly marked out, namely, to create a Prussianized German Empire.

Between 1818 and 1842 the first phase of this policy was facilitated by the Zollverein, or customs union, which brought the coveted territory into an economic alliance with Prussia. From 1842 to 1867 Prussia was busy with diplomatic intrigues and aggressive measures which were designed to convert her economic domination into political sovereignty.

The first step in this procedure was to regenerate the Prussian Army, which had failed to perform any particularly glorious exploits since Leipzig and Waterloo. This was accomplished through the efforts of William I, aided by the able but autocratic and reactionary statesmen and military experts, Von Roon, Von Moltke, and Bismarck. The latter, a true "Junker," was the most sinister genius in European politics in the nineteenth century. Though one of the most astute political leaders in history, he was, after Metternich, the bitterest enemy of democracy in his time, and was a more thoroughgoing exponent of Machiavellian diplomacy than Frederick the Great. For more than a quarter of a century he applied all of his truly terrific energy to making Prussia supreme in Germany through his famous policy of "blood and iron."

After having perfected Prussia's military preparations, Bismarck cast about for a pretext to induce a war with Austria in order that the latter might be humiliated and deposed from her predominant position in the German Confederation. This eagerly sought opportunity came in 1866 through the dispute over the future disposition of the Provinces of Schleswig and Holstein, which Bismarck had induced Austria to aid him in wresting from Denmark two years before. The carefully laid Prussian plans bore fruit in the crushing defeat and overthrow of Austria at the battle of Sadowa. Prussia was then free to seize Schleswig and Holstein, Hanover, Hesse-Cessel, and Nassau, and became dominant in the North German Confederation formed in 1867, thus completing the first chapter of Bismarckian policy.

The next task was to make Prussia supreme in a unified, autocratic, and militaristic German Empire. To accomplish this purpose Bismarck recognized that another foreign war would be necessary in order to weld the South German States to the Prussianized North German Confederation. Stirring up a false fear of France in the South German States, Bismarck was able to obtain their military alliance with Prussia. It was now essential to bring about a common war with a foreign country so that this military alliance might be transformed into a firm political union. Carefully calculating its effect upon French sentiment, Bismarck secretly urged the Hohenzollern Prince Leopold to accept the offer of the vacant Spanish throne. Through the storm of indignation which arose in France over this act, Bismarck, by the distortion of a telegram from the Prussian King, and aided unwittingly by the hot-headed and hair-brained French foreign minister, the Duke of Gramont, and the Parisian war party, was able to induce France to make war on Prussia.

Prussia's elaborate military preparations, which had been in steady progress, made easy a humiliating defeat of France, and the enthusiasm of this brilliant success was sufficient to give rise to the German Empire, in which Prussia was supreme in policy, military strength, and constitutional arrangements. A crushing indemnity laid upon France and the seizure of the French Provinces of Alsace and Lorraine left an open sore in European politics. This would furnish a possible basis for another European war which Bismarck foresaw might be indispensable to the next move in Prussian policy to make the German Empire supreme in Europe.

IV. THE PRUSSIANIZATION OF THE GERMAN EMPIRE, 1871–1914.

The ambition for European supremacy furnishes the key to Prussian internal policies and diplomatic intrigues since 1871, as truly as the ambition for a German preeminence explains Prussian politics from 1815–1871.

Hardly had the new imperial system been thoroughly organized when its bureaucracy was used to crush the growing liberal party of social democracy. This was done by inducing the autocratic German Government to adopt the chief reform policies of the Social Democrats and thus take away the very ground from beneath their feet, and by retaining the semifeudal system of representation which excluded them from their legitimate share in the Government.

Such was the condition of the German Empire in 1888 when there came to the throne of Prussia and hence to the head of the German Empire, William II, a Hohenzollern who seemed to combine all the typical characteristics of his family. He preserved the patrimonial divine-right theory of government of Frederick William I, thought himself possessed of the versatile genius of Frederick the Great, and maintained the energy and aggressive military policies of his grandfather. Bismarck's policy of "blood and iron" was fully adopted as the program of "I, God, and the army."

The new Emperor, while at first posing as a social reformer, was an even more bitter enemy of the party of social democracy than Bismarck, and allied himself to the "Junker" class, the mortal enemies of liberalism and the sworn devotees of autocracy, militarism, and Pan-Germanism. All phases of German policy and administration were directed to the achievement and preservation of autocratic irresponsible government and increased military power.

To make this policy an integral part of the popular sentiment of Germany, there issued from the center of junkerdom at Berlin the most systematic campaign of Chauvinistic, militaristic, and imperialistic education in the history of Europe. This was based on the pseudo-Darwinian philosophy expounded by writers like Bernhardi; on the anti-social, anti-Christian, "might makes right" philosophy of Nietzsche; and on the crude nationalistic doctrines of the great German philosophers and historians of the nineteenth century. It was all designed to glorify war as the supreme instrument of national development and to emphasize at every point the universal superiority of the German peoples when led by Prussia and her God-favored ruler.

Such a state of mind is intelligible only when one understands that Prussia, through diplomatic intrigues, military aggression, and the imitation of the culture and industry of other peoples, had passed from a semifeudal condition to the head of a great national and industrial state in less than half a century. Thus, instead of representing an old and established stock people or "Urvolk," as Fichte had maintained, Prussia is really an upstart in international society and brings with her all the aggressiveness, arrogance, pride, and bad manners of the parvenu.

But William II, with all his bigotry and militarism, was a pacifist as compared with the extreme Pan-Germanic Junker Party, which allied itself to the semi-imbecilic crown prince and dominated the Prussian general staff. This party, which controlled the Emperors' actions in July, 1914, and his diplomacy during most of the previous decade, boldly and frequently proclaimed Germany's fitness and destiny to rule the world.

To carry out this criminal ambition to dominate the planet, Prussianized Germany secured the subordination of Austria to her plans and obtained by intrigues with the Balkan States and Turkey concessions for a direct line of communication from Hamburg to Bagdad, thus opening the way to the East. The colonial empire in Africa was strengthened and spheres of influence were developed in South America and the Far East.

By 1905 Germany began to be impatient to "feel out" her growing powers and to discover whether the other European nations entertained a healthy respect for her strength and destiny. No less than five serious international crises were forced upon Europe by German policy between 1905 and 1914, any one of which might have precipitated a European war if the other nation had not backed down before Germany's high-handed conduct. France was bullied in regard to Morocco in 1905–6, in 1908, and again in 1911. Russian weakness after the war with Japan was exploited by Prussia through a tariff war and the encouraging of Austria to seize Bosnia and Herzegovina and thus to violate the treaty of Berlin with the same equanimity that Prussia later displayed in violating neutral territory and treaties in 1914. Again, in the Balkan War of 1912–13, Austria was suppotred in that further bullying of Serbia which led to the extreme anti-Austrian feeling in Serbia that resulted in the murder of the Austrian Crown Prince in 1914.

V. THE PRUSSIAN WAR OF 1914.

In view of the Prussian attempts at diplomatic bullying just enumerated, it did not augur well for the peace fo Europe, when in 1913 Germany planned greatly to increase her already enormous armaments. However, it is not difficult to understand this belligerent attitude. Russia had keenly resented the Prussian insults in 1908 and 1912–13 and had set herself to so thorough a military reorganization that she alone might seriously challenge the military supremacy of Prussia in a few years. The social democrats were attaining such strength and confidence that the representatives of the semifeudal Prussian autocracy knew well that their days were numbered unless some great crisis, such as a European war, could bring a temporary check to the growing stream of liberalism. Again, the Pan-Germanists who had rallied around the Crown Prince were confident, domineering, and aggressive. Finally, the great army and its officers were chafing under its long inactivity. It was little wonder, then, that Prussian junkerdom eagerly availed itself of the opportunity of 1914 to make the final test of the power of the political system it had been building up for more than half a century.

The immediate events which led to the outbreak of the war in July, 1914, are too well known to need repetition. Germany's arrogant support of the atrocious demands of Austria upon Serbia; her bullying and summary ultimatum to Russia, which this time refused to be "bluffed" as in 1908 and 1912–13; her haughty rejection of diplomatic overtures; and her ruthless and cynical violation of treaties, neutral territory, and international law are now among the indisputable facts of history.

Though foiled in its attempt to effect a speedy conquest of western Europe, the Prussian military machine has achieved almost complete success in its eastern campaign. The whole of that vast and coveted territory from Hamburg to Bagdad has been brought under the complete control of Berlin. Were Germany to make peace by retiring to the Rhine in the West she would have won a military and territorial victory compared with which the military exploits of Frederick the Great and Bismarck pale into insignificance. She has more than trebled her territory and brought under Prussian domination since 1914 a population greater than that of the United States. The following table showing the situation at the beginning of 1917 will demonstrate that the previous statement is by no means an exaggeration:

1. The masters:
Prussians		40,000,000
2. Vassal peoples:
South and Austrian Germans	33,000,000
Magyars	10,000,000
Bulgars	5,000,000
Turks	6,000,000
		54,000,000
3. Enslaved peoples:
French	3,000,000
Belgians	7,500,000
Alsatians, Lorrainers	1,500,000
Danes	200,000
Poles, Lithuanians	22,000,000
Ruthenians	5,500,000
Czechs	8,500,000

3. Enslaved Peoples—Continued.
Jugo-Slavs	11,000,000
Roumanians	8,000,000
Italians	800,000
Armenians	2,000,000
Levantines	2,000,000
Ottoman Greeks	2,000,000
Arabs	8,000,000
4. Total under Prussian domination, 1917		176,000,000

These figures, taken in conjunction with the above map, which shows the territory inhabited by these peoples, convey some impression of the tremendous task to which the United States has become a party in the effort to liberate Germany and the world from the domination of Prussian Junkerdom. It also gives an effective answer to those who contend that Prussia is already beaten.

It is plain that it will require great military pressure and the most intelligent diplomacy to detach the South Germans and the Austrians from their alliance with Prussian absolutism, to separate the Prussian Social Democrats from their doubly fatal alliance with the Prussian autocracy, and to liberate the alien races now enslaved by Prussia.

That the "Berlin philosophy" is not yet repentant can be easily seen from the closing words of the bitter diatribe against England recently written by Prof. Eduard Meyer, Germany's greatest living historian and a former exchange professor to the United States, in which he enumerates the three fundamental institutions to which Germany must cling if she is to fulfill her destiny in the world, namely: "Our military organization; our economic organization; and lastly, a virile monarchial government placed wholly beyond the influence of party strife, and wholly independent to act, that it may be free to combine and utilize all the forces of which the nation is capable. For the beneficent results of this action we had every reason to be grateful when the outbreak of the war found us fully prepared, while every day that the war continues gives us renewed evidence of its efficiency."

When the greatest Prussian historian speaks thus, American citizens must realize that Prussia must be beaten down by force of arms before she can again be treated as a liberalized modern nation.

CONCLUSIONS.

The foregoing shows how for centuries Prussia has been systematically building up an autocratic empire by aggressions and for further aggressions.

Her battle cry in August, 1914, was: "Weltmacht oder Niedergang" (World dominion or downfall). Thus in her mad pride she avowed her purpose to dominate the world.

By the war of 1870 against France she consolidated the South German Confederation into the German Empire

Her essential purpose in the present war is to clinch her present hold on the vast and continuous domains of Austria-Hungary, the Balkans, and Turkey.

If Prussia can do this she will in reality have won the war even though she retire from France, Belgium, and Poland and indemnify them. She will have won because she will have increased her autocratic dominion from less than 70,000,000 people to over 170,000,000—an increase by the present war equal to the population of the United States.

Then at her chosen moment again she will attack, perhaps with new allies, to make complete in both hemispheres her world dominion. Her history and her present announcements both forecast this as her intent.

Her present peace talk and her future peace talk is and will be solely to preserve her present dominion approximately as shown in the last map.

For America and her allies to make peace until we have broken forever this dominion which Prussia has won in the present war would be to bequeath to our children the certainty of a still greater and more horrible war followed by fetters such as she is now attempting to rivet on her allies.

Therefore we must carry on this war, without one thought of peace, until we have shattered the grip of Prussia on Austria-Hungary, the Balkans, and Turkey for all time.

If we do not carry on this war to this end, our grandsons will be the conscript soldiers of Prussia to help her conquer Asia or Africa, or else our grandsons alone will have to defend their land against Prussia and her Asiatic or African allies of the future.

To end the world warring of Prussia the web she has woven from Hamburg to Bagdad must be shattered through force of arms supplemented by intelligent diplomacy.

It is as necessary to the safety of America as it is to that of her allies that we realize that now this war is our war as fully as it is their war—that we all fight it with all our might to the only end which will make the world safe for democracy.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

PETITIONS.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Long Beach, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation providing that the Dental Corps shall consist of commissioned officers of the same grades and proportionately distributed among such grades as are now or may hereafter be provided by law for the Medical Corps, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Santa Ana, Cal., praying that a labor census be taken and that a system of industrial conscription be put into force, and indorsing stringent measures for the suppression of criminal syndicalism, which was referred to the Committee on the Census.

LOCK AND DAM IN MERMENTAU RIVER, LA.

Mr. RANSDELL. From the Committee on Commerce, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 2785) to authorize and empower the Southwest Louisiana Waterways Association, of the State of Louisiana, to construct a lock and dam in Mermentau River, in the State of Louisiana, and I submit a report (No. 112) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill, as it is an emergency matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The Senator from Louisiana asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill just reported by him.

Mr. PENROSE. I did not hear what the bill is about.

Mr. RANSDELL. It is a bill authorizing the Southwest Louisiana Waterways Association to construct a lock and dam on a little river in Louisiana, in order that the salt water may not back up on the rice and destroy it. It is a tidewater stream. The Government will not be involved in any expense. The bill simply grants a permit to the local people to construct this lock and dam. It has the approval of the Chief of Engineers, and everything about it is local. I hope no objection will be made.

Mr. PENROSE. I have no objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Southwest Louisiana Waterways Association, of the State of Louisiana, be and is hereby, authorized to construct a lock and dam in the Mermentau River at some suitable point, to be approved by the Secretary of War: Provided, That said lock and dam shall be constructed and maintained wholly at the expense of said association and in accordance with plans and specifications approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War: Provided further, That no toll shall be imposed at any time for the passage of any craft through said lock: And provided further, That the operation and care of said lock and dam, with funds provided by the association, may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be assigned to the engineer officer of the United States Army in charge of the locality.

SEC. 2. That this act shall be null and void unless the privilege hereby granted shall be availed of within two years from the date hereof.

SEC. 3. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRADING WITH THE ENEMY.

Mr. RANSDELL. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 4960) to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 111) thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 2815) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Goodwin Davison (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 2816) granting the consent of Congress to the Gainesville Red River Bridge Co. to construct a bridge across Red River; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. LODGE:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 96) to grant American citizenship to William Francis Griffitt Blackler; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

ADDRESS BY JAMES H. POU.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a copy of an address delivered by Hon. James H. Pou, August 14, 1917, at a patriotic meeting of citizens of Raleigh, N. C., under the auspices of the Red Cross.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"A great war applies the acid test to the people of the countries involved. Like an X-ray picture, war makes manifest things which during peace were not disclosed, and whose existence was often not suspected. Many plain citizens during peace follow the even tenor of their ways and are regarded as commonplace ordinary men.

"War comes, and unconsciously to themselves and unexpectedly to the public, these men assume new habits and a totally different attitude. They cease to be plain men and they become heroes. They promptly answer the call to duty, and in answering they achieve that nobility of soul which comes only from the performance of a patriotic and unselfish duty. And some attain immortality.

"The Rhode Island Quaker blacksmith toiled at his forge for years before his neighbors suspected what the Revolution would make of Nathanael Greene.

"Joseph Warren was a physician, well known in his own town, but scarcely heard of elsewhere. The Revolution came. He did not believe the Americans had munitions sufficient to hold Bunker Hill. He advised against the attempt. He was overruled, and the effort to fortify and hold the heights was determined upon. He was offered chief command. He declined, but volunteered as a private, and was killed in the battle fighting as a private, with a commission as general in his pocket. At a stride he left the ranks on Bunker Hill for a place in the temple of immortality.

"Probably more places are named for these two men—Greene and Warren—than for any other men of the Revolution, Washington alone excepted.

"War is the great solvent. It separates the pure from the base metal and presents men as they are and not as they seem.

"War gives, along with its trials, hardships, and sacrifices, opportunities never available in peace. It gives the man who may have made a bad, unfortunate, or ineffective start in life a chance to begin again under different conditions. He has a second chance with the promise if he makes good in the second effort his former failure shall be forgotten, and the glory of his latter effort shall become a patent of nobility.

"When our Civil War began two of the least promising of men were Grant and Sherman. Both men were West Point graduates. Both had served in the Regular Army and had left it. Both went into other business and had not succeeded. Grant had farmed; then worked as a tanner; clerked in a store; then hauled wood. Bad habits chained him, and bad luck seemed his twin brother. He volunteered, and went to Springfield to offer his services. His record and his appearance were against him. His attitude was that of the conscious failure. He was given slight encouragement and was put to work copying muster rolls in the basement of the capitol. Civilian officers who could not drill their companies or regiments learned that a West Point graduate was working in the basement. They asked him to help in getting their troops in shape. His work immediately put new life and an altogether different appearance on these companies. His own worth was demonstrated and he was quickly given a regiment. Eight years later he was inaugurated President of the United States, the youngest man to attain that honor.

"Sherman, after leaving the Army, tried banking in California and commission business in New York without success. Then he opened a law office in the Middle West. No clients. Like many other competent lawyers, despite talents, character, and industry, he did not succeed. His office dried up and he blew away. The war found him teaching school in Louisiana, the very picture and image of a man without any bad habits who had failed to make good. 'He had gone up against it and bounced back.'

"He was so hard up that it was assumed that he would be glad to take any job offered to him, and without asking him where he stood in the contest a commission as an officer of Louisiana State troops was made out and tendered him. He declined, frankly stated his position, went North, joined the Army, rose rapidly, stated that 200,000 men were necessary to break the lines of the Confederacy in the West, was believed to be crazy, and was so regarded for a while.

"And when Grant became President he delivered the command of the Army to Gen. Sherman. Except for the war these two men would probably have been written down as complete failures; sore disappointments to friends and relatives.

"This war will develop many Greenes, Warrens, Grants, and Shermans, and countless thousands of less distinguished heroes.

"The men who shall render service in this war will, during the balance of their lives, rule the Nation, both in politics and in business. And better still, many a man who heretofore has not been able to control himself will hereafter become master of himself, his habits, and his circumstances. Many a man now regarded by himself and his friends as a failure, with nothing to hope for in the future, will come back from the war with head erect, eye steady, grip firm, and an air of confidence in himself never seen before. We will see the unsuccessful boy transformed into a seasoned, disciplined, efficient man.

"Horrible as it is this war has some compensation for those who shall do their part. And many men will find their success in life began the day they took their places in the ranks of the American Army. I never knew a man who went to the Civil War on either side and who returned with an honorable discharge or worthy record express regret that he went to the Army. I have heard many who did not go express the keenest regret that they did not.

"The acid test of war likewise shows what is mean, unpatriotic, and vicious in our natures. It discloses the yellow in us, if there be any. It gives the bad citizen an opportunity to show how unpatriotic he can be. It enables the citizen of low, selfish, and groveling ideas an opportunity to register his name and call his true number. It enables every man to grade and register his peculiar and personal standard of citizenship. And these strange and unfortunate creatures, who by nature are against all things and particularly against their own Government, are given opportunity to show how closely their ideals of citizenship approximate what the law calls treason.

"You hear these men whispering words false in fact and approaching treason in purpose and intent. They are saying that the war is wrong and that the draft is unconstitutional. They say that we can not send our armies beyond the bounds of this country without their consent. They say that we should wait until the Germans land on American soil, then declare war. France, Belgium, Russia, and Serbia all waited until Germany attacked them. You see the result—destruction of life and property unheard of heretofore; old men, priests, children murdered—women outraged by countless thousands, shaming the dark ages. This is what it means to wait for the Germans to invade. The men who advise us to wait for the Germans to invade America mean that after American cities have been burned, after American farms have been turned into deserts, after American citizens not engaged in war have been butchered or enslaved, and after American women have been ravished, then they will be men enough to fight. But they are mistaken. They will not fight even then. They will grovel at the feet of the enemy, or they will hide in the swamps.

"We will fight to prevent these things, and we will fight now, that a German Army may never invade America. The man who will not fight now will never fight. Count on that and watch the man.

"These men say that this is a rich man's war, when never before in any war has America placed so nearly the entire cost of the war on the rich. They say it is a bondholders' war, when bonds were sold for par, at a low rate of interest, and are held by the largest number of people who ever participated in a bond issue.

"They say they can not approve of the draft and of universal military service, when they know this to be the only way to preserve equality of service. The sons of the poor and the unknown have the same rights and the same chances as the sons of the rich and the influential. The man who would keep his son out of the Army is the very man who would send his neighbor's son to the front. Universal service makes impossible the bounty soldier, the hired substitute, the 20-negro law exempt, and the other subterfuges behind which many cowards sought shelter in the Civil War, while better men went to the front.

"They say that in establishing a food control the Government—claiming to be against trusts—has established the greatest of all trusts. True; but Uncle Sam is the trustee, and all his children are beneficiaries. It is a trust to protect the public, not a trust to oppress. Uncle Sam is determined that none of his children shall suffer for the necessities of life while those necessities remain abundant in the land. Speculation shall not corner the market and fix high prices for the millions. The Government has decreed that the man with money shall not forestall the market, take over the food supply, and dictate prices to the man who buys next week's supplies with this week's wages.

"Some carping critics object to the food-production and conservation campaign. They say that the Government has no business trying to control the industries and habits of the people. All the Government is asking of us are the things we ought to do, which are to our advantage to do, without being asked. We are asked to make and save, as near as possible, what we eat, because of the world-wide scarcity of foodstuffs, and because of the difficulty of transporting food from one section where abundant to another where scarce. We have raised great crops of food—vegetables, fruits, and so forth. We are urging people to save these products against the time of certain need next winter. Instead of helping in this work these critics—who in the past have always advocated growing food supplies at home—are doing all they can to encourage waste. They write and talk against our movement, and advise that all food-producing and conservation work be stopped. They say that the people have all they can stand; that this is a bondholders' war; that the money powers are responsible, and so forth. I have seen the letter.

"They complain of railroad service, and forget that service has been reduced because the Government has taken over rolling stock and locomotives for use in France, and because vast amounts of rolling stock is being used and will be used for months yet in moving troops and their supplies.

"In all great wars of the past troops have been carried in freight or stock cars, and often on flat cars. Our Government is endeavoring to carry every soldier in a passenger car. To do this it must restrict civilian passenger service. We who do not go to war must consent to be crowded if we travel, and if sometime we fail to get a seat immediately, we should remember that our slight inconvenience is the result of an effort to make our soldiers more comfortable. We should be ashamed to complain. Our ladies should be willing to put their baggage on the floor when necessary to give other women seats beside them. Seats in a passenger car should not be piled with grips and bags, while a woman with a baby in her arms looks in vain for a seat until some man gives her his. Put the bags, grips, and so forth, on the floor, and let the woman have a seat, even though she be a stranger and be not fashionably dressed.

"These critics complain of the censorship, and say that free speech is denied. They prate of the inviolable rights of the citizen and assert the time-honored rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and so forth. But they fail to draw the distinction between freedom of speech and advising the commission of crime. The first is lawful, the latter unlawful, now and always. Always unlawful, it becomes dangerous and even treasonable during war.

"These people may abuse the President, criticize Congress, berate our Army and Navy much as they please. They show a low citizenship, an absence of patriotism, and exceeding great folly. But they commit no crime. But the moment they advise a man to disobey any rule, law, or lawful order of the Government, they commit a crime, and may be punished for felony or possibly for treason.

"Thus, these people may abuse President Wilson to their heart's content, and they will be visited with nothing worse than public contempt. But the moment they advise a drafted man not to appear, or an enlisted man to desert, they become guilty of felony.

"There are some who are very near to, if in fact they have not already, crossed the line which separates folly from criminality.

"These critics tell us that this is not our war; that we have no business in it; that we are fighting other peoples' battles. True, we are fighting with a large part of the civilized world, but we are not fighting for them any more than they are fighting for us. The mad dog of the world is after them as he is after us. We and they are fighting for life. If they slay the dog we are blessed. If they slay him we are fortunate we are fighting together, but each one fights for himself, and any assistance he may render to another is secondary and consequential. Civilization is in danger and all her children are fighting.

"Three years ago when Germany went to war she had no immediate hostile design on the United States. She planned and arranged for the war on the hypothesis that England would not fight, and consequently Japan would not; that Italy would remain neutral or join with her; and that Turkey would act as Germany should order. With this plan outlined, Germany thought she could immediately isolate Russia by closing the outlet from the Baltic to the North Sea, while Turkey kept the Dardanelles. Germany knew her fleet was stronger than that of France, and she expected to destroy the French fleet. Her plan contemplated that Germany should be supreme at sea. She planned to use sea traffic as an asset and to deprive her greatest enemy of all access to the sea and to close all French ports with a powerful and effective blockade, while easy access to Germany north of Great Britain and to Italy and Turkey through the Mediterranean should be maintained by German, Austrian, and, if necessary, the Italian fleets. She had her fleets planted in every sea and scout ships and cruisers near many harbors ready to seize all French and Russian ships and to blockade their ports. The army and fleet at Kio Chau were to guard Vladivostock and blockade Russia's Pacific coast. The Pacific fleet was to scour that great ocean and leave no enemy ship afloat. So convinced was she of the success of her plans that she left on purpose in all the great harbors of the world many of her finest ships. In English, American, Chinese, Portuguese harbors and in the ports of many other nations the finest and largest of Germany's merchant marine were purposely left when war was declared. Germany determined on war at the Potsdam conference early in July, 1914, and she could have drawn her ships home, but she wished them where they were, so they could be sent anywhere and converted into warships. They would first have swept the seas of French and Russian ships and then they would have returned to peaceful commerce, carrying German trade to all the rest of the world, while Germany crushed France and Russia at her leisure. Germany planned to use the seas as an asset and as a weapon to defeat her enemies. She would have succeeded and she would have won the war before Christmas, 1914, but for the colossal crime and folly of the attack on Belgium.

"Germany planned to fight three wars in quick succession, using the gains in each to help win the next.

"She intended to crush France and Russia in 1914, then attack England, and if she would not trade with Japan, to attack Japan also, then to attack us. The Belgium crime combined all these wars into the struggle now being fought. Germany is now fighting for world mastery, and the fate of the whole world is at stake.

"Had Germany respected Belgium's neutrality and her own pledged word, attacked Russia in force while fighting France defensively, neither England nor Japan would have entered the war. The English harbors would have been open, likewise those of Belgium. Transportation would have gone on almost unimpeded in the Atlantic; absolutely so in the Pacific. The war would have ended on schedule time with an astounding victory for Germany. She would have stood across the world a very colossus, and no nation would have dared challenge or deny her supremacy. The world escaped this by the narrowest of margins. In blind, criminal folly and lust of blood Germany attacked Belgium. England grandly and heroically answered the challenge, and though unprepared, entered the war. Two weeks later Japan came in and Italy announced that she would never fight England or France. Germany, to her amazement, found that her plans had miscarried and that she could not use her fleets or ships purposely placed in every ocean and port. The seas were being used against her, not for her. German ships, not enemy ships, were driven from the ocean. She was not the hunter but the hunted. By Christmas, 1914, German sea commerce had disappeared and all German warships not in hiding in German ports had been captured or sunk. The great German ships in neutral harbors were afraid to leave. Instead of blockading and strangling her enemies, Germany was being blockaded and strangled. What did she do?

"For six months Germany had fought on the seas according to the laws of nations and the rules of civilized warfare, and she had lost the seas. On February 4, 1915, she announced the she had up to that time conformed on the seas to the rules of civilized warfare but that in the future it would declare a paper blockade around the British Isles and, by use of her submarines, sink vessels going to England, and that her submarines might by mistake sink neutral vessels. President Wilson answered with his note of February 10, 1915, signed by Bryan, in which due notice was given that the Government would hold the German Government to a strict accountability if any American life were lost because of the unlawful acts of the German Navy. On February 16, 1915, Germany replied and in her note used these pregnant words:

"Up to now Germany has scrupulously observed the existing provisions of international law relative to maritime war.

"But she claimed that because England had been able to establish an actual and effective (and therefore legal) blockade of all German ports, she, Germany, would declare a paper blockade around the British Islands and sink any vessel attempting to reach English shores. An effective blockade of an enemy port is always legal. But an ineffective blockade is never legal, because it allows some vessels to pass while others must not. It becomes not a blockade, stopping all traffic, and thereby becoming a recognized and efficient instrument of war, but an attempted regulation by one power of the right of all other powers, even though friendly and neutral, to use the free high seas for commerce. A paper blockade is a claim of the ownership of the seas by one power, and if other powers acquiesce the claiming power acquires title.

"Germany asserted this claim in February, 1915, after she had lost all hope of sea dominion. We denied her claim and asserted our rights. On May 1, 1915, Count Bernstorff inserted in New York papers advertisements officially warning Americans not to travel on certain ships—an unprecedented act—and on May 7 the Lusitania was torpedoed, and over a hundred American citizens—many women and children—lost their lives. Germany had made war on us, and when she realized that war was imminent and that war with us was not at that time to her advantage she began a frantic effort to prevent, or at least postpone, the war she had begun. On May 9, 1915, she began to give President Wilson assurances that American lives would be safeguarded, all property damage paid for, and all disputed cases arbitrated. Germany's notes for 18 months after the sinking of the Lusitania demonstrate that she did not want war with us then. The German communications of May 9 and September 1, 1915, show this attitude clearly.

"But the seas remained closed to Germany, and she gained many victories on land. She broke the Russian lines in May, 1915, and later captured almost all of Poland, Courland, and Livonia. Still later she overran Serbia, Montenegro, and Albania. Bulgaria came to Germany's aid, and the line to Constantinople was opened. The allies, though now aided by Italy, Portugal, and later by Roumania, could gain no great victory. All the combatants were getting tired. In the fall of 1916, in the high tide of success, Gen. Brousiloff was stopped by orders from Petrograd, and it became apparent that terms had been arranged or were being arranged for a separate peace between Russia and Germany. All fighting between these countries had ceased since September, except a little deceptive and fraudulent aid rendered by Russia to Roumania. The offensive on the Somme in the summer and fall of 1916 had been a keen disappointment to the allies. With Belgium and the Balkans conquered, Russia quieted, Japan compensated, Germany thought she had only England, France, and Italy to fight. She believed the submarines, if given free hand, could beat England, and she believed the German and Austrian armies could then quickly destroy France and Italy. She concluded that if she withdrew all her promises to us, made and oft repeated since the Lusitania, we might not fight. If we did not fight then, she knew we would never fight. We would be publicly acknowledging the supremacy of Germany. She was encouraged in this belief by the campaign watchwords magnifying peace and the slogan, 'He kept us out of war.' On the other hand she believed that if she entered the war she would win anyway, and she could collect out of us a huge indemnity, and she would be mistress of the world.

"Holding these views, Germany, without giving any notice, on the afternoon of January 31, 1917, curtly withdrew every promise she had heretofore made and with phrases of insult presented our minister at Berlin a note which contained a declaration of savage warfare against all mankind. In the note was this paragraph:

"Under these circumstances Germany will meet the illegal measures of her enemies by forcibly preventing after February 1, 1917, in a zone around Great Britain, France, Italy, and in the Eastern Mediterranean all navigation, that of neutrals included, from and to England and from and to France, etc. All ships met within that zone will be sunk.

"Before sending this note, and while pretending to be friendly with us, Germany proposed to Mexico to give her Texas and several other American States if she, Mexico, would join Germany in war upon the United States, and further requested Mexico to arrange with Japan to join Mexico and Germany in war upon us.

"Thus war came to America. Germany believed it was to her interest to avoid war in the spring of 1915, and she believed it was to her interest to force war in 1917. She did both. War in 1915 would have brought certain and quick defeat, and she made promises sufficient to preserve peace. In 1917 she believed war would not be to her disadvantage and she forced war with brutal frankness.

"President Wilson did not wish war. He ran great risk in preserving peace. The country ran grave risk in relying on German promises and in maintaining a precarious peace for two years. But the revolution in Russia may justify our cause. If we had entered the war in May, 1915, Germany would have been defeated but Russian tyranny would have been given a longer lease on life. Probably the greatest good has been accomplished and that all the world, including Russia and Germany, will hereafter be free.

"The war is our war, and it is not a Democratic or partisan war—Republicans and Progressives are just as earnest in their support of the war as Democrats. Roosevelt, Taft, and Hughes are as valiant and patriotic as Wilson and Parker, and these are all the men now living but one who have been nominated for the presidency by any party during this generation. It is a national war and the existence as well as the honor of the Nation is at issue.

"That our Army and our Navy will do their duty I do not for a moment doubt, and we who do not now go to the front have duties which we must perform with the same steadfastness, courage, and sacrifice that the soldier shows in battle.

"We must pay taxes willingly, promptly. We must produce, conserve, economize, and forego temporarily many rights we have heretofore exercised. Freedom of speech must be preserved. But to preserve freedom, it may be necessary to close the mouths and stop the presses of those who preach sedition and incite to treason. We may have to ask our railroad friends to forego temporarily the eight-hour law, but with the pledge to restore it when the war ends. The Army must be moved and supplied at all hazards. Our railroad employees are patriots and they will make this sacrifice for the Nation's safety.

"So much for the general subject. Now, for home. Wake County has done everything she has been called upon to do. She has bought bonds. Her sons have enlisted or registered. She has given the war Y. M. C. A. and the Red Cross more than was asked. In every respect Wake has shown patriotic zeal.

"The State council of defense has appointed a committee of six men—Col. Charles E. Johnson, Messrs. B. S. Jerman, C. B. Barbee, Daniel Allen, J. Cooper Young, and the speaker—and has designated it 'The Soldiers' Business Aid Committee for Wake County.' A subcommittee, of which Col. James H. Young is chairman, will specially advise about colored soldiers.

"Its duties are to aid soldiers in their business affairs, by making loans on security which would not be accepted in banks, and allowing time after the end of service to repay. It is in no sense a charity. A soldier can avail himself of the committee's aid without loss of dignity or self-respect. He is required to give note, with such security as may be available; and he is expected to repay the loan. If he wishes the committee to pay interest on a mortgage and prevent foreclosure he will give security if he can. If he can not do better, he will be asked to give the committee a second mortgage on the land, to secure the interest the committee may pay on the first mortgage. If he wishes the committee to pay premiums on life insurance, he will give a note secured by a proper transfer of the policies so the committee can be safe for what it may advance. Other life arrangements will be made where business affairs require it. Other means of assistance will be offered as the different demand for them may arise. Help to dependents, while the soldier is away, will be made in deserving cases. If a soldier be disabled by wounds or disease he will be helped in obtaining special training, so he may enter any trade or profession open to one in his condition. In any legal proceedings in which a soldier may be interested, like partition of land, the committee will look after the soldier's interest if requested and without expense.

"After the war the committee will assist soldiers in getting jobs, and to that end will keep in touch with large employers and will ask them to give the soldier preference.

"Wake County lawyers will gladly prepare any legal papers, will, deeds, etc., for any soldier regardless of color on request.

"All soldiers are requested to register before the county election officers, so they may vote next year, even if they be out of the State. The absent voters law (Ch. 23, p. 78, Public Laws of 1917) provides for voting by men who may be away from home on election day provided the voter shall have personally registered before leaving. If he does not register before he leaves he can not vote. The law provides for absent voting but not for absent registration. If you wish to preserve your vote see the chairman of your county board of elections and see that you are properly registered. If you be registered, you can send your vote by mail. The chairman of the board of elections can register you now or at any time before you leave. Do not fail to register before you leave. Some man may be running for office next year on a yellow-dog platform, pro-German, pacifist, peace at any price, and you will wish to vote against him. You will shoot against enemies in front and vote against enemies at home. Election officers will make no charge for registering, and I am sure will aid every soldier regardless of race in preserving his franchise. If the soldier can substantially comply with constitutional amendment he will be registered even if his spelling, punctuation, and pronunciation be a little substandard. If a man fight for his country, technicalities and rigid scrutiny of his educational qualifications must not be used to deprive him of his rights to vote. This principle must be upheld whether the applicant for registration be black or white.

"The committee will keep a book, and the book will contain a complete history of its work. Every contributor will be listed with the amount contributed. Every soldier assisted will be listed; and if he repays or shall fail to repay loan that fact will be entered. After the committee shall have completed its work, this book will be delivered to the State council of defense for examination and audit. All moneys on hand, including all loans repaid, will be returned pro rata to the contributors, and the book preserved in the State library as part of the State's permanent records. This book will often be referred to during the next hundred years by persons who may wish to prove that they or their ancestors render some valuable and noncompulsory service in this great war.

"The work of this committee will largely be confidential, and no soldier need fear that his affairs will be made public.

"We have granted assistance in one case so far. The soldier has given his consent that I may mention it to show the work and the method. He was making $25 per week at his trade and was getting along comfortably with a wife and one child. He belonged to the Coast Artillery. Soon after he was called to the colors, his wife was taken sick and had to go to the hospital for an operation. He arranged with a physician to wait for his pay, arranged for his child's board but told us that he did not see how he could meet the hospital charges out of his pay, $35 per month, as a soldier. We examined his case, conferred with the officers of his company, found him honorable and worthy. We promptly and gladly granted him the assistance he asked, will take care of the hospital bills, and allow him reasonable time after his service shall have ended to repay what we shall have advanced. He has given note to that effect. This is not charity. It is a business transaction, just like he would make at a bank, except that we take security which a bank could not lawfully take. I feel confident that this loan will be repaid, principal and interest. We are furnishing this patriotic soldier with credit to meet an unexpected and unavoidable expense.

"Now, two instances where we did not help. An insurance agent came with a note given him for the first premium on a policy he had just sold to a soldier. He wanted us to pay the note or buy it. In view of the intention of the United States to provide new insurance for all soldiers, we think we should restrict our efforts to taking care of premiums on policies already in existence. We told the agent that he had best hold his note.

"Another suggested that we take care of a mortgage on a drafted man's land and mules. But upon inquiry we found that the seller of the land was the father of the drafted man, that almost nothing had been paid on the land or mules. We thought this man might never go to the Army, and if he did, his father should hold the land for him. And if he goes to the Army, he had best sell his mules, as his crop is finished. These three cases are given as an idea of what this committee will do and what it will not do.

"Our idea is to help those who can neither help themselves and who have no kin or friends who will keep them.

"If a soldier can make his own arrangements, or if he has family or friends who will attend to such matters for him, our advice is not to come to us, but if he needs emergency help and can not get it elsewhere, we will gladly help in all worthy cases. We will promptly turn down unworthy applications. We will be careful not to have anything 'put over us.' We depend entirely on voluntary contributions. We hope to repay a great part, possibly all that is put in our hands. We are determined that no worthy Wake County soldier shall suffer deprivation of property, nor his dependents suffer hardship, if we can prevent.

"The committee has money for all present needs, but calls may increase, and we wish to have enough always in the hands of our treasurer, Mr. B. S. Jerman, to meet promptly any call made on us. We must not wait to raise money. We must have the money ready for instant use. I now ask the people of Wake County to place at least a thousand dollars in our treasury for use in this work. We may hereafter need more; if so, we will ask for it with full assurances that it will be supplied. Whatever be left or repaid—and we expect most of it to be returned—will be paid as a dividend to all contributors pro rata. Pay to Mr. B. S. Jerman, treasurer, to-morrow what you wish to advance for Wake County soldiers.

"Out of the horrors of this war will arise a greater and better people, a stronger and freer citizenship, and higher ideals of government and of life. Out of bloody welter of this war will come many compensations. We will find a higher efficiency, and we will have a warmer sympathy for our fellow creatures and a greater willingness to share burdens. We will understand as we never have before understood the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man.

"There will be a fuller understanding and a deeper sympathy between the races here at home. Misfortune has prevented that heretofore. Black men fought bravely in the Civil War, but against us. Politics estranged us. Now we will fight together. A white regiment will save a black regiment when sorely pressed, and in like circumstance a black regiment will risk its life for a white one. We will be comrades in arms. After the war better friends than ever.

"We are fighting, not for love of war, but because we love peace well enough to fight for it. We are making war upon the idea and incarnation of war. We are fighting to make this the last war. If it ends right, it will be the last great war—the last war between civilized, enlightened nations. If we can have such a peace, the war will have been worth all its costs. Our soldiers have proven their patriotism. They have answered their country's call. They have pledged their lives. We ask no proof of their devotion. But I want to know if we who remain at home be worthy of the men who go? I propose to this audience that we here and now take upon ourselves five simple but solemn pledges. I have personally taken each and all, and God being my helper I will keep all.

"Here they are:

"1. We pledge ourselves not to say or do anything during this war which will weaken the hands of our Government, or which could give aid, comfort, or encouragement to the enemy. Will you pledge this? If so, raise your hands and say, 'Yes.' If you will not, answer, 'No' and bow your heads.

"2. We pledge ourselves during this war to do promptly and cheerfully all which our Government shall ask us to do, the same being in our power.

"3. We pledge ourselves not to support any candidate for office who does not whole-heartedly support our country's cause in this war.

"4. We pledge ourselves not to let the family of a soldier suffer for want of anything we can supply.

"5. We pledge ourselves to give preference in all things, where practicable, to the soldier who went and did his duty over the man of military age and fitness who did not go.

"My soldier friends, you have heard these pledges. They speak for Raleigh, for Wake, for North Carolina, for America, for most of the civilized world. They are the voices of not only thousands here to-night but of a thousand million human beings in every quarter of the globe. You have the gratitude, prayers, and love of the human race. May the God of our fathers go with you, remain with you, sustain you, guard, preserve, and save you; and in His own good time bring you back safe. Amen."

POSTMASTER.

INDIANA.

James H. Spilman, Milroy.

WITHDRAWAL.

Executive nomination withdrawn August 23 (legislative day of August 15), 1917.

Col. Henry De Witt Hamilton, New York National Guard, to be a brigadier general in the National Army.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, August 24, 1917.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, August 15, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

MILITARY INSURANCE.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I have here a pamphlet on family allowance, indemnity, and insurance for our soldiers and sailors, The Duty of a Just Government, by Hon. William G. McAdoo. It is about three and one-fourth pages and it sets forth the views of the Secretary of the Treasury on the proposed military insurance. I ask to have it printed as a public document.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator to let it go to the Committee on Printing, because we have other matters there, and we will take them all up.

Mr. HUSTING. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The matter will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

WAR REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hollis	Martin	Sherman
Bankhead	Husting	Myers	Shields
Brady	James	Nelson	Simmons
Broussard	Johnson, Cal.	New	Smith, Ga.
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Smith, Md.
Culberson	Kellogg	Overman	Smith, Mich.
Curtis	Kendrick	Page	Smoot
Dillingham	Kenyon	Pittman	Sutherland
Fletcher	King	Poindexter	Swanson
France	Kirby	Ransdell	Thompson
Frelinghuysen	La Follette	Reed	Trammell
Gerry	Lodge	Robinson	Watson
Gronna	McCumber	Saulsbury	Weeks
Hale	McKellar	Shafroth	Wolcott
Hardwick	McNary	Sheppard

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. HUGHES] on account of illness. I ask that the announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is absent on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is necessarily detained on important public business.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to inquire whether the committee amendments have been disposed of?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair advises the Senator that they have not been disposed of. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The next committee amendment passed over is, on page 4——

Mr. HOLLIS. Before section 2 is passed over I will state that I offered last evening to be printed an amendment to section 2. On looking at it this morning I find that one entire page was omitted. I have sent it back to be printed correctly, and if I can have unanimous consent to offer the amendment later I will do so after it is printed. If I can not, I shall offer it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair advises the Senator that no unanimous consent is necessary. The amendment being a motion to strike out and insert will be in order.

Mr. HOLLIS. To section 2?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, just a parliamentary inquiry supplemental to that presented by the Senator from New Hampshire. As I understand the rule as modified by any agreements which have been entered into here at any time, even after we move on to the next section of the bill or some subsequent section and before all the committee amendments are disposed of, a motion to strike out the entire section on income taxes and offer a substitute therefor would be in order, would it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly; when the committee amendments have been disposed of that amendment would be in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is rather important for me to know. I am having some computations made upon two amendments which I want to offer. They are to the income-tax section of the bill. It is a matter of some hours to complete those computations. I wish to have the opportunity, and I think I have the right under the rule, even supposing the committee amendments to this section that we are now considering were all disposed of and we moved on to the consideration of the next section, the war-profits tax; even while we were considering that section, I understand if no amendment were pending before the Senate, the income-tax section having been disposed of so far as committee amendments are concerned, I would have the right to move to strike out that section and offer a substitute therefor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the Senator would.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If that is so, I shall have plenty of opportunity to have my computations completed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. However, it is not within the power of the present occupant of the chair to preclude the determination of that question when it arises.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I quite understand that, of course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment of the committee passed over will be read.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, we had an agreement that the committee amendments should be disposed of first. I think by unanimous consent we violated that unanimous-consent agreement when we took up the amendment yesterday, but it seems to me that the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from New Hampshire, or any other Senator who has an amendment to section 1 or section 2, or any other part of the bill, would have a right to offer an amendment after all the committee amendments have been disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin predicated his statement on the theory that there would be no amendment pending at the time he offered his amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. At the time it is offered, of course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The attention of the Chair has been called to the former unanimous-consent agreement, which is the customary agreement affecting committee amendments, that they be disposed of first, and while a committee amendment is pending, of course it would not be in order to offer any other amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suppose that the amendment I offered on yesterday was perhaps out of order under the unanimous-consent agreement that had been entered into.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Chair will pardon me, I do not think it was, for this reason: When we are considering a committee amendment we have a right to amend it in any way, even to present a substitute for it, and the Senate is not bound down to just the pure amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thanks the Senator from Georgia for his suggestion. The Secretary will report the next amendment passed over.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 4, line 9, before the word "taxes," to strike out "The" and insert "That the," so as to read:

SEC. 3. That the taxes imposed by sections 1 and 2 of this act shall be computed, levied, assessed, collected, and paid upon the same basis and in the same manner as the similar taxes imposed by section 1 of such act of September 8, 1916, except that in the case of the tax imposed by section 1 of this act

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 4, line 15, after the word "exemption," to insert "of $3,000 and $4,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, in line 27, after the date "1916," to insert "as amended."

Mr. NORRIS. I did not notice when the Secretary was reading that the insertion of the words "of $3,000 and $4,000" was, in reality, a committee amendment, which I now see. I ask that that committee amendment be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Nebraska that the committee amendment has been agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand. I am asking unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which it was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the amendment just agreed to be reconsidered. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, that is simply a transposition from line 18 to line 15.

Mr. NORRIS. I can not hear what the Senator says, but permit me to state to the Senator the only thing I want to reach. It is suggested to me by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] that probably this is not the place to reach it. I am opposed to the change in the exemption, and I want to be heard briefly on it. I notice that an amendment has been offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] which is on our desks this morning in which he strikes out the exemptions of $1,000 and $2,000 and inserts $2,000 and $3,000 in place of it. I simply wanted to protect the right the Senator from Florida or myself or any other Senator might have when it comes to individual amendments to offer that amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I supposed that was what the Senator had in view.

Mr. NORRIS. That is all I care to do.

Mr. SIMMONS. What I desired to call the attention of the Senator to was that the figures "$3,000" and "$4,000," in line 15, are a mere transposition. Those figures originally appeared in the bill in line 18, but for the purpose of making the section more consistent the committee transposed the figures to line 15, making no change at all aside from the transposition.

Mr. NORRIS. I see.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair asks Senators to suspend conversation. The confusion in the Chamber is so great that the Chair is unable to hear the colloquy.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is simply a transposition; that is all.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand; but let me suggest to the Senator that, technically speaking, if a Senator desires to propose to change that he would have to propose it now, I presume, or he would lose his right. I have no objection to the transposition; I think the committee made better language of it by transposing it. In the meantime, I do not want to lose the right to contest the lowering of the exemption, and if it is understood that that will not be lost I have no objection to this amendment being agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, we have not lowered it at all. We have kept it just as it was passed by the House. The $3,000 and $4,000 exemptions apply to the present law, and without changing the action of the House we are saying that for the purpose of this act the exemption shall be $1,000 and $2,000 instead of $3,000 and $4,000.

Mr. NORRIS. I am inclined to think the Senator from North Carolina is right. I withdraw my request for a reconsideration. It is plain to me that every Senator would have a right when it comes to individual amendments to move to strike out "$1,000" and "$2,000."

Mr. SIMMONS. Undoubtedly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment reported by the committee.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 4, in line 17, after the word "sixteen," to insert "as amended"; and in line 18, after "$2,000," to strike out "instead of $3,000 and $4,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I sent to the desk on yesterday afternoon an amendment which I proposed to offer to this section, to strike out the exemption of $1,000 for unmarried men and $2,000 for married men and to insert in lieu thereof an exemption of $2,000 for unmarried and $3,000 for married men. As a matter of parliamentary information, I desire to know whether it is proper that that amendment be offered at the present time or whether it should be offered after all of the committee amendments throughout the entire bill have been considered and passed upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the amendment of the Senator from Florida is not in order at this time and will not be in order until the committee amendments shall have been disposed of, under the agreement entered into on August 10, 1917, by which it was undertaken that all committee amendments should be first disposed of. The Secretary will state the next committee amendment.

The next amendment of the committee was, on page 4, line 20, after the word "act," to insert "as amended"; and in line 23, after the word "provided," to strike out the remainder of the section, down to and including line 5, on page 5, as follows:

And (c) the provisions requiring the normal tax of individuals to be deducted and withheld at the source of the income shall not apply to the new 2 per cent normal tax herein prescribed until on and after January 1, 1918, and thereafter shall apply only to incomes exceeding $3,000 as provided in Title I of such act of September 8, 1916.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should now like to have the attention of the members of the committee and also of other Senators. I think it is not realized that this is a very important amendment. This is the amendment, as I understand, which proposes to strike out of the law the provisions for the collection of the tax at the source.

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps I had better explain that, if the Senator will yield for that purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. This is not the provision which proposes to strike out the collection of the tax at the source, except in so far as it relates to nonresident aliens. As to nonresident aliens, that is the only way we can collect such a tax. This amendment proposing to strike out is simply to conform to the amendment already agreed to in the first section of this title. I will read it to the Senator, and if he will follow this language he will understand it.

Mr. NORRIS. From where does the Senator intend to read?

Mr. SMOOT. I will read from page 1, beginning in line 8, as follows:

And paid a like normal tax of 2 per cent upon the income of every individual, a citizen or resident of the United States.

This amendment eliminates nonresident aliens. The only way we can collect the tax from a nonresident is at the source; but collection returns of taxes from citizens of the United States are based on information. Now, if the Senator will turn to page 109, I will call his attention to the part of the bill which has reference to withholding at the source.

Mr. NORRIS. From what page of the bill does the Senator now propose to read?

Mr. SMOOT. From page 107, section 1205 (b), beginning on line 14, which has reference to a change from collection at the source to collection by information at source.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But where is the language which makes this provision at the bottom of page 4 apply to aliens? I do not find it here.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Michigan that we are not proposing to change the law as to nonresident aliens; we are going to collect at the source from them; but we find it necessary to strike this provision out because we made an amendment on page 2 of the bill applying only to citizens or residents of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And that, in connection with subdivision (b), page 107, covers——

Mr. SMOOT. That covers the question of collecting at the source.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. BRADY. May I ask the Senator from Utah a question relative to what the law will be——

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BRADY. I desire to ask the Senator from Utah, in order that I may understand him correctly, what the law will be if we should pass the bill as reported by the committee? Do I understand that if we adopt this provision of the bill——

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean this particular amendment?

Mr. BRADY. I refer to this particular amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. The effect of adopting this particular amendment would be that, while to-day we collect the taxes both from citizens and nonresident aliens from the source, we would still collect the tax from nonresident aliens at the source, and from citizens of the United States by information at source.

Mr. BRADY. That was the information that I wanted. The Senator from Utah has made a satisfactory explanation.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Michigan has asked me to explain as to why we changed the law from collection at the source to collection by information at the source. I will say to the Senator that I should very much prefer to wait to do that until we get to page 107, because I am quite sure it is going to lead to quite a lengthy discussion.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to say, Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question.

Mr. NORRIS. While I do not myself know how I shall vote on this proposition, I have read a great deal of literature on the subject and have heard quite a number of gentlemen in regard to the matter who have presented various arguments against the action of the committee. I have been quite impressed with some of the matters which I have examined, but I have been so busy with other work that I do not claim to be in possession of sufficient knowledge to act intelligently. I only want to have the Senate understand what it is doing and to let Senators understand when we are passing on this question that it eliminates from the law the authority given to the officials of the Treasury Department to collect at the source.

There is a bankers' association, as I understand, that has taken quite an active interest in this matter. It seems to me they have shown—I do not know what the other side may be able to show—that a great many dealers in bonds have sold bonds under an agreement with their clients who have purchased them that they would protect them from all taxation. This, in effect, permits them to free themselves from that agreement and adds that burden to the holders of the bonds, as I understand.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Those contracts include the provision that the tax shall be paid at the source?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; many of them do include that provision. The contracts were made with the idea of the law providing that the bond dealers should pay these taxes, and the bonds were sold under an agreement which is known as a tax-free agreement. It seems to me we ought not to change the law, after, under a law of Congress, thousands of such agreements have been made and thus relieve bond houses from the payment of something which they have agreed to pay and from the payment of which they have agreed to protect their customers.

I do not quite understand why this provision does not have that effect. It says:

> And (c) the provisions requiring the normal tax of individuals to be deducted and withheld at the source of the income shall not apply to the new 2 per cent normal tax herein prescribed until on and after January 1, 1918.

Why that date?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator that the question ought to have been raised when we reached the amendment on the first line of page 2 of the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is easy to go back and have that amendment reconsidered.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to say to the Senator from Nebraska that the committee decided that it would change the principle of collecting at the source to one based upon information at source. The first amendment along that line is the amendment on line 1, page 2. The amendment to which the Senator has just referred is simply to make the bill conform to the first amendment which has already been adopted.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the pending amendment is the question of striking out the language beginning with "and" on line 23, page 4. If we do not desire to change the present method of collecting these taxes at the source, this is a pretty good time to accomplish that result. I do not understand why so many people should complain about it, unless changing the system does interfere with contracts that have been made quite generally.

Mr. SMOOT. I will state to the Senator——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment. I have just stated to the Senator that we have already adopted the amendment on line 1, page 2, of the bill, and having agreed to that amendment, this amendment becomes necessary. It is only to conform to the first amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose we agree to both of them, what effect will they have on the collection of taxes at the source?

Mr. SMOOT. It will have this effect, that upon all citizens of the United States the tax will not be collected at the source, while upon nonresident aliens the tax will be collected at the source.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me ask the Senator a question.

Mr. NORRIS. Then this is a vital amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. The first amendment was a vital amendment, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me ask the Senator a question, if I may.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the pending amendment is adopted and this language is stricken out these assessments will be paid by the person who happens at the time to have in his possession the property, regardless of the manner in which he acquired it. This being the law, this being the custom, there must have been some wisdom in it. It certainly will relieve the Government of the necessity of an inquisitorial search for these securities, because it goes directly to the source, and those who withhold the tax have protected themselves, either by contract or otherwise.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to say right there that a great many people are very much opposed to collection at the source; for instance, the lessors of property. The idea of a lessee withholding the rent is something that it seems to me to be absurd, because the Government ought to look to the owner of the property instead of to the lessee of the property. In leases where there are provisions of forfeiture it works a complication by which a long lease may be forfeited by the withholding at the source the amount of the tax. For that reason I am very much opposed to any withholding at the source. I believe that the Government can collect this money without such a requirement, and it complicates the matter. The collectors of internal revenue are every one of them against it; they say they are opposed to it because it causes more trouble and discontent and more objection to the income-tax law than any other one thing in connection with it. I want to be certain when I vote in favor of the amendment offered by the committee that I am voting to strike out the proposition of withholding at the source.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There is no doubt about the fact that if we strike out the language proposed to be stricken out by the pending amendment the only people who will pay at the source will be aliens, and evidently it is proposed to make them pay at the source because their place of residence is uncertain.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to suggest in this connection that the collection at the source to a large extent has been a failure. There are thousands of small mortgages all over the country, such, for instance, as those given by farmers, in connection with which, I think, as a rule, the tax has not been withheld at the source. To my certain knowledge in hundreds of cases the mortgagor has gone on and paid the interest on the note and the tax has not been withheld. How could it be withheld? How can a farmer who pays the interest on his mortgage withhold from that interest the portion of it subject to the income tax? It is the most difficult thing in the world; and I do not think the law has operated at all effectively in that respect. As the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] has said, it has caused more trouble than almost any other feature in the law.

Mr. McCUMBER, Mr. SMOOT, and Mr. SIMMONS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFCER. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think it quite appropriate that there should be given at this time the real reasons which actuated the committee in making the change, and I can give them in a very few words. They have already been suggested to a certain extent by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH].

Let us remember, first, that the department reported to us that the amount withheld at the source was very inconsiderable, while the system of keeping book accounts and making the returns was made so complex as scarcely to be understandable by the average person who is required to make out income-tax returns. Remember that on a great many of the sums where the taxes were withheld at the source, there were no taxes whatever due from the parties entitled to receive such sums, because they were small sums accruing to the holders of stock whose entire incomes were below the tax requirement. Although no tax is paid, yet it is necessary under the present system to report those items and to state upon which of them the tax has been paid at the source, and how much that tax would be.

It is almost impossible under this complex system for the average individual to understand fully what particular items of tax have been withheld at the source. A man receives an income from stock in a bank, and even though he may secure an income of but a few hundred dollars from the stock he owns he has to report that the tax has been withheld by the bank. He does not know positively, unless he reads this law carefully, whether it has been withheld or whether it has not been withheld; he may have no knowledge concerning it.

Take the case of a mortgage, referred to by the Senator from Minnesota. This mortgage, made by a great mortgage company, may finally go into the hands of some widow who has only four or five hundred dollars to loan. The interest is collected by the company and is sent on to the holder of the mortgage. The mortgage company has no means of knowing whether the owner is subject to the tax or whether the tax should be withheld at the source. Nevertheless it must be withheld and paid to the Government.

Now, consider the complexity of the situation. It was found that it was far better to get your report generally from the source, and that is the only benefit that we did get from it—the information that it contained as to who was receiving these sums. It was found to be far better to get your information and allow the person who receives the money to determine whether or not that money should pay taxes, and make a report accordingly.

If you got the information, the office could refer back there and ascertain whether or not the party making the report had made a fair one and whether or not this money was taxable.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I should like to ask my colleague a question. My colleague mentioned the returns from banks. Of course, under the law with regard to the collection of the corporation tax all such taxes are withheld at the source.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. And it has worked admirably. I do not know of a better system that could be applied than to compel the bank to withhold all the tax before the dividend is distributed to the stockholder. Now, why would not that rule apply with equal advantage in other matters?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have stated why. I have stated why it would not apply at the bank, even.

Mr. GRONNA. But I will say to the Senator it does apply at the bank.

Mr. McCUMBER. It does not. Here is an individual who receives $100 from a bank as a dividend upon stock.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. That income was not taxable at all.

Mr. GRONNA. If it is not taxable, it can not be withheld at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. The great majority of the people of the United States do not pay an income tax at all, and the bank could not tell whether the party the tax upon whose income it withheld was in fact subject to a tax.

Mr. GRONNA. Oh, well, this does not apply to anything except where the income is taxable.

Mr. McCUMBER. How does the banker know whether it is going to be taxable in the hands of the person who receives it? He has to hold it out anyway, whether it is taxable or not, and then allowance has to be made, and that has to be deducted. If it is found that he has paid a tax, it will be deducted by a system of bookkeeping from the income of the party making the return. Now, you escape all of this in the system which has been adopted by the committee, and adopted upon the recommendation of the Treasury Department.

Mr. GRONNA. My colleague has asked me how it will be done. I will say for his information that I have made out a few statements myself withholding the tax on dividends to people who hold stock. Of course, it has been in a small way, but I think every banker is familiar with the law. I think every banker knows what the rate of taxation is; and it is an easy matter to figure out the amount that ought to be charged against that stock dividend, and it is figured out.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, the trouble does not lie with the bank. The bank can do it very easily. The trouble is with the individual who makes out his return. He has got to report that he received a certain amount from a bank, and that upon that sum the tax was paid at the source, and he is therefore allowed to deduct that sum from his income in making out his return. Now we add to that complexity by providing other conditions, conditions relating to the amount that will be allowed to be retained in the way of surplus without the payment of any tax, and we fix different rates of tax according to the amount of income that is retained for the business of any corporation. So that, taking the matter as a whole, it makes the report so complex and so expensive, with practically no good to be obtained, that the Treasury Department recommended the repeal of that provision of the law, and the committee saw good reasons to change it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to follow the suggestion of the Senator from North Dakota, who, in my opinion, has made a very important and clear statement about the difficulties connected with the present system. His colleague says that he has deducted at the source the tax on income which he has distributed. How did the Senator from North Dakota know that the person receiving that income would pay any tax at all upon it?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I think the Senator misunderstands me. It was not necessary for me to know that at all.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. You are taking it out of his income.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator from Michigan should happen to have stock in one of my little banks, and the law provides that the dividend is subject to a tax of, say, 2 per cent, or 5 per cent, or whatever it may be, I would simply withhold the 5 per cent and pay that to the Government. Now, when the Senator from Michigan makes out his return to the tax collector or to the Government he of course will have to take into consideration the amount of the stock dividend; but he has a right to deduct whatever has been retained by the bank in that way.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Suppose he does not pay anything at all?

Mr. GRONNA. Then there is no return made, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No return from the source?

Mr. GRONNA. There is a return made at the source by the bank.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. But in case the entire dividend is paid to the stockholder and the tax is not paid at the source, how does the Senator from Michigan know that it ever will be paid? The fact is that it never will be paid.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The point I am trying to get at is this: From the statement of the Senator's colleague, many people receiving small dividends, and not liable under any provision of the law to pay an income tax, might possibly have their incomes diminished at the source, which would not know whether or not the person from whom the amount of the tax was deducted was to be liable.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, let the Senator take this illustration: Suppose a person receives a yearly income of less than $1,000. That person is not compelled to make a return at all under the law. There is nothing to compel him to make a return.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No.

Mr. McCUMBER. Now, we will say that $100 or $500 of that income came from one of my colleague's banks. The tax has been paid, but he was not liable for that tax. Nevertheless the tax has been paid and he has got to get it back from the Government.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How is he going to get it back?

Mr. McCUMBER. Why, he has got to make his application and get it back from the Government. It has been paid on an income on which he was not liable to a tax at all.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] had the floor. The Senator from Michigan succeeded to it. To whom does the Senator from Michigan now yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield to the junior Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not wish to be put in a false light. I want to say to my colleague that there has been a great deal of money collected in the way I suggested, and I do not think he will find one single instance where an application has been made for the return of the money. But why should not any man who has stock in a bank or who has stock in any corporation, be compelled to pay a tax on whatever stock he may have? As my colleague has suggested, if the dividend were paid to the stockholder the Government would not collect anything at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say why. Because the Government has seen fit to exempt from the income tax every person who does not under the present law earn more than $3,000 or $4,000 if married, and under the proposed law unless he earns more than $1,000 or $2,000, as the case may be.

Mr. SMOOT obtained the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will pardon me, before he begins his speech, I think we are rather wasting our time, because this argument will have to be duplicated when we reach that question. We really have not reached the question of substituting information for withholding.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We are right up to that subject now.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I think not, except as it applies to the $3,000. This provision that the committee has figured out, and which is the amendment we are now considering, is only put in by the House for the purpose of taking care of the change which they have made in the exemption from $3,000 and $4,000 to $1,000 and $2,000. That is the only effect of that provision, as I understand it.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I will say to the Senator that that is not the effect of the amendment we are considering. We are considering the amendment at the bottom of page 4.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the one I am talking about.

Mr. SMOOT. That, Mr. President, has a connection with the amendment that we agreed to on line 1, page 2, where we changed the collection of the normal tax from all individuals to only individuals who are citizens of the United States.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. And that, of course, is involved in the question of the collection at the source.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, incidentally, the question of the nonresident alien is involved.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that is exactly what I say.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is involved; but that is not the merits of the question. I do not suppose anybody would object to withholding——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a suggestion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I suggest that this amendment be passed over, with the understanding that it shall be taken up in connection with the other amendment to which the Senator refers.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think that is a very good suggestion.

Mr. NORRIS. Then we can dispose of them both together.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing to do that, Mr. President. Perhaps that would save time, and that is what we want now. When we reach the title "Income tax amendments," then the whole question will arise; and whatever we do in relation to those amendments, then we can come back and pass upon this.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question about this amendment at the top of page 2.

Mr. SMOOT. That is included in the request of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is included?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. There will be a reconsideration of those amendments if we change the other part of the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. All I want to ask the Senator is this, and probably he can answer it right now: As I understand, that relieves nonresident aliens who have business in this country from paying this increased 2 per cent tax.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no, Mr. President; it does not relieve them.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to know what it does do, then?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator wants me to go into the discussion, it all has reference to sections in the title, beginning on page 99, Title XII, "Income-tax amendments"; and to answer the Senator's question fully I would have to go into the whole question.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I shall be perfectly willing, then, to let it go over in connection with these other matters; and I will ask the question, probably, at that time.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that is the best thing to do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the pending amendment will be passed over until later.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 5, line 6, after the words "imposed by," to insert "subdivision (a) of"; in line 8, after the word "sixteen," to insert "as amended"; in line 9, after the words "tax of," to strike out "two" and insert "four"; in line 13, after the word "that," to insert "subdivision of that"; in line 15, after the word "section," to insert "for the fiscal year ending during the calendar year 1917"; in line 17, after the word "that," to strike out "portion" and insert "proportion"; and in line 18, after the word "income," to strike out "for the fiscal year ending during the calendar year 1917" and insert "for such fiscal year," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 4. That in addition to the tax imposed by subdivision (a) of section 10 of such act of September 8, 1916, as amended, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a like tax of 4 per cent upon the income received in the calendar year 1917 and every calendar year thereafter, by every corporation, joint-stock company, or association, or insurance company, subject to the tax imposed by that subdivision of that section, except that if it has fixed its own fiscal year, the tax imposed by this section for the fiscal year ending during the calendar year 1917 shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid only on that proportion of its income for such fiscal year which the period between January 1, 1917, and the end of such fiscal year bears to the whole of such fiscal year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 25, after the words "imposed by," to insert "subdivision (a) of"; and on page 6, line 2, after the words "hundred and," to strike out "sixteen" and insert "sixteen, as amended," so as to make the clause read:

The tax imposed by this section shall be computed, levied, assessed, collected, and paid upon the same incomes and in the same manner as the tax imposed by subdivision (a) of section 10 of such act of September 8, 1916, as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, after line 2, to strike out sections 5, 6, and 7, in the following words:

SEC. 5. That every individual, corporation, joint stock company or association, or insurance company, that is liable to pay or that has paid the taxes imposed by Title I of such act of September 8, 1916, upon the net income received in the calendar year 1916, shall pay, in addition to such taxes, a tax equivalent to 33⅓ per cent of such taxes, to be assessed and collected under the provisions of existing law, and paid on or before September 15, 1917, except that in the case of a corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company, which has fixed its own fiscal year, such tax shall be paid within 165 days after the close of the fiscal year ending during the calendar year 1917.

SEC. 6. That on and after January 1, 1918, individuals, partnerships, withholding agents, corporations, joint-stock companies or associations, and insurance companies liable for the payment of income, munitions, or excess-profits taxes, under existing law or under this act, shall pay, without levy, assessment, or notice, simultaneously with the submission of their return of tax, the amount of tax for the payment of which they are shown by such return to be liable. If any tax is not paid at the time when it is due under the provisions of this section, there shall be added (except in the case of an error made in good faith in computing the amount of the tax) the sum of 5 per cent to the amount of tax unpaid and interest at the rate of 1 per cent per month upon the amount of such unpaid tax from the time it becomes due. This section shall not apply in the case of any income tax (payable otherwise than by a withholding agent) imposed upon an individual upon whose net income no tax is imposed under subdivision (b) of section 1 of such act of September 8, 1916, or under section 2 of this act.

SEC. 7. That collectors of internal revenue are authorized to receive uncertified checks in payment of income, munitions, and excess-profits taxes, during such time and under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe; but if a check so received is not paid by the bank on which it is drawn the person by whom such check has been tendered shall remain liable for the payment of the tax and for all legal penalties and additions the same as if such check had not been tendered.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I do not know whether these sections are covered by other provisions in the bill, or why they are stricken out.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state the reason to the Senator. These sections stricken out are the provisions of the House bill which relate to what is ordinarily known as the retroactive income tax—that is, the imposition of a tax upon incomes of 1916.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They ought to go out.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in addition to what the Senator has stated, I will say that section 5 is the retroactive section; section 6 is amended and will be found in section 1009, on page 92 of the bill, in lieu of this section. Under that amendment we cover all internal-revenue taxes——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, we are on section 5 now. The first thing stricken out is section 5.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood the Secretary to state that the amendment proposed to strike out all beginning on line 3 of page 6 down to and including line 22 of page 7.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was the statement of the Secretary.

Mr. SMOOT. That is as I understood the Secretary.

Mr. SIMMONS. If that is the case, then, in addition to the retroactive taxes on incomes of 1916, it includes the special flat tax of 12½ per cent that we imposed under the act of September 8, 1916, upon the total net income of corporations or individuals producing and manufacturing munitions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 23, to change the number of the section from "8" to "5"; in the same line, after the words "extend to," to insert "Porto Rico or"; in line 24, after the words "and the," to insert "Porto Rican or"; on page 8, line 2, after the words "force in," to insert "Porto Rico or"; and in the same line, after the words "Philippine Islands," to insert "respectively," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. That the provisions of this title shall not extend to Porto Rico or the Philippine Islands, and the Porto Rican or Philippine Legislature shall have power by due enactment to amend, alter, modify, or repeal the income-tax laws in force in Porto Rico or the Philippine Islands, respectively.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 4, before the word "Profits," in the headline, to strike out "Excess," so as to make the head read:

Title II.—War-profits tax.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Title II.—War-profits tax," on page 8, after line 4, to strike out:

SEC. 200. That in addition to the tax imposed by Title II of the act entitled "An act to provide increased revenue to defray the expenses of the increased appropriations for the Army and Navy and the extensions of fortifications, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1917, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a like excess-profits tax of 8 per cent upon the income received in the calendar year 1917 and every calendar year thereafter by every corporation, joint-stock company or association, insurance company, and partnership. Such tax shall be computed, levied, assessed, collected, and paid, for the same years, upon the same incomes, upon the same basis, and in the same manner as the tax imposed by Title II of such act of March 3, 1917, as amended by this act. Income derived from dividends upon stock of other corporations or partnerships which are subject to the tax imposed by this title and Title II of such act of March 3, 1917, shall be exempt from the tax imposed by this title and the tax imposed by Title II of such act of March 3, 1917.

SEC. 201. That sections 200, 202, and 204 of the act entitled "An act to provide increased revenue to defray the expenses of the increased appropriations for the Army and Navy and extensions of fortifications, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1917, are hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 200. That when used in this title—

"The term 'corporation' includes joint-stock companies or associations, and insurance companies;

"The term 'United States' means only the States, the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii, and the District of Columbia; and

"The term 'taxable year' means the 12 months ending December 31, excepting in the case of a corporation or partnership allowed to fix its own fiscal year, in which case it means such fiscal year. The first taxable year shall be the year ending December 31, 1917, except that in the case of a corporation or partnership which has fixed its own fiscal year it shall be the fiscal year ending during the calendar year 1917."

"SEC. 202. That for the purpose of this title, actual capital invested means (1) actual cash paid in, (2) the actual cash value of property paid in other than cash, for stock or shares in such corporation or partnership, at the time of such payment, and (3) paid in or earned surplus and undivided profits used or employed in the business: Provided, That the good will, including trade-marks and trade brands, or the franchise of a corporation or partnership, is not to be included in the actual capital invested, unless the corporation or partnership made payment therefor specifically as such in cash or tangible property, the value of such good will, trade-marks, trade brands, or franchise, not to exceed the actual cash or actual value of the tangible property paid therefor at the time of such payment."

"SEC. 204. That corporations exempt from tax under the provisions of section 11 of Title I of such act of September 8, 1916, and partnerships carrying on or doing the same business shall be exempt from the provisions of this title. In the case of professional partnerships having no substantial capital, the income derived from the professional services of the partners shall be exempt from the provisions of this title. Income derived from dividends upon stock of other corporations or partnerships which are subject to the tax imposed by this title shall be exempt from the provisions of this title."

And to insert sections 200 to 210, inclusive, the first of which was read, as follows:

SEC. 200. That when used in this title—

The term "corporation" includes joint-stock companies or associations and insurance companies;

The term "domestic" means created under the laws of the United States, or of any State, Territory, or District thereof, and the term "foreign" means created under the laws of any other possession of the United States or of any foreign country or government;

The term "United States" means only the States, the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii, and the District of Columbia;

The term "taxable year" means the 12 months ending December 31, excepting in the case of a corporation or partnership which has fixed its own fiscal year, in which case it means such fiscal year. The first taxable year shall be the year ending December 31, 1917, except that in the case of a corporation or partnership which has fixed its own fiscal year it shall be the fiscal year ending during the calendar year 1917. If a corporation or partnership, prior to March 1, 1918, makes a return covering its own fiscal year, and includes therein the income received during that part of the fiscal year falling within the calendar year 1916, the tax for such taxable year shall be that proportion of the tax computed upon the excess profits during such full fiscal year which the time from January 1, 1917, to the end of such fiscal year bears to the full fiscal year; and

The term "prewar period" means the calendar years 1911, 1912, and 1913, or, if a corporation or partnership was not in existence or an individual was not engaged in a trade or business during the whole of such period then as many of such years during the whole of which the corporation or partnership was in existence or the individual was engaged in the trade or business.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, at this point perhaps it would be well enough to have an understanding with the chairman upon the parliamentary status of the amendment which I have offered to the excess-profits provision of the bill. I do not presume that the chairman of the committee contemplates the consideration of that section at this time. I should like to have an agreement with him or an understanding as to when this provision of the bill is to be considered and when and what time my amendment will be in order as a substitute for the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. My understanding is that we shall take up now the substantive provision. What has been read by the Secretary to this time are mere matters of definition. We have now reached the substantive provision of the House excess-profits scheme. I understand the Senator from Alabama has prepared something in the nature of a substitute for that scheme.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; for the Senate committee provision.

Mr. SIMMONS. I would assume that the substitute could now be offered and considered.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if he has completed the income-tax provisions of the bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. In reply to the Senator I will say that so far as I know all pending amendments to that title have been acted upon. Just a moment ago we passed over an amendment because it was naturally connected with an amendment later in the bill. With that exception, as far as I now recall, all the amendments have been acted upon. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] did offer an amendment, but I think he withdrew it to have a reprint, and it is not now, I understand, pending.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, if I may be allowed to state my understanding, when any section of a bill has been perfected and amendments to it adopted, then it is not open to anyone in Committee of the Whole to offer an amendment to the text afterwards. So far as the amendments that have now been adopted to section 2 it will not be open to anyone afterwards to amend those parts of the bill itself, but it will be open to anyone at any time to offer to strike out an entire section and substitute a new section with different provisions.

Now, take the case in hand. I understand the committee offers an entire new section as an amendment. When that section is once adopted by the Senate, the Senate will have acted on that section in its entirety and afterwards it will not be open to amendment under the rule.

Of course, by unanimous consent, we can do anything; but, under the rule, unless the Senator offers his amendment now—if he waits until the entire section which is a new section is adopted—he will not be allowed later in Committee of the Whole to amend it, and he will have to wait until the bill gets into the Senate.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What I am trying is to ascertain definitely, in order that there may be no misunderstanding about it, what time under the rule I must offer my amendment. I am exceedingly anxious, and I think it is only fair, that the committee should complete its income-tax provisions, because the two are closely related and one may affect the other.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator from Alabama will yield to me, as I understand it the committee is now offering section 201, about to be read. As soon as it is read, before action is had upon it, the Senator from Alabama ought to offer his substitute.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what I stated a little while ago.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If we should adopt section 201, then, of course, it would preclude the substitute. Before we reach that stage I wish to present some criticisms upon section 201 myself, as I could not vote for it in its present shape and so stated when the committee had the subject up for consideration.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Just one moment further. Whether the Senator desires to wait until section 201 is read before he presents his substitute I do not know. He can informally present it now and formally present it as soon as the section is read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the matter is perfectly plain. The only difficulty arises from the number of things included in the proposed amendment of the committee. The Secretary has undertaken to report the amendment of the committee as an amendment substituting the entire title which contains several sections. The Chair will state that it is perfectly proper for the Senator from Alabama to offer his amendment as soon as the amendment of the committee to which he proposes his amendment, which is the form in which he offered it, is read.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I quite understand that, but my contention and insistence is that the committee ought to perfect and complete the income-tax provisions of the bill before this proposition is taken up, because they are, as I have said, related propositions, and whatever conclusion the Senate comes to with reference to the income-tax provision of the bill may affect in some degree my amendment. I hope the Senator from North Carolina will proceed with the income-tax provision of the bill and complete it so that we may understand exactly what it is to be. As I said, I think the chairman of the committee will concede that the two are related, and when the Committee of the Whole has finally decided upon the provisions of the income tax provided for in the Senate committee amendment, I think the chairman can see that they are so related that one might affect the other. It seems to me perfectly fair that the Senate should first perfect the income-tax provisions. Will not the Senator from North Carolina agree to that?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have every disposition to accommodate the Senator from Alabama and especially also his colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] who is absent, and who I know desires to speak upon this title of the bill. The difficulty is that I do not know of anything in connection with the income tax except the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire which has not been disposed of. I believe there are some little readjustments to the so-called Gerry amendment brought about because of the fact that after this amendment was adopted the Senate adopted the Lenroot amendment. That is a mere matter of a few minutes I think to conform the rates. I wish to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if his amendment is in shape to be offered now.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, my amendment is in shape so that I can go on with it. I have corrected two or three copies. But that is not the difficulty. This morning at the opening of the session there was an understanding——

Mr. NEW. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me for a moment? I wish to have clear in my own mind the parliamentary status at present, if the Senator will indulge me for just a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the Senator from Indiana if I have the power to do so or to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. NEW. I thank you. Do I understand that section 200 has been adopted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not think as yet anything has been adopted, as the title is treated as a single amendment in the way the Secretary read it.

Mr. NEW. Then, to set myself clear, I want to put my position before the Chair and the Senate. I offered an amendment several days ago which was printed and laid upon the desks of Senators. It is, I think, in order at this time. If it is in order, I merely wish to reserve the right to present it after the matter now before the Senate has been considered. Before section 200 has been finally passed I wish an opportunity to have it considered, that is all.

Mr. HOLLIS. At the outset of the session this morning there was a colloquy between the Presiding Officer and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] in which it was stated by the Presiding Officer that the further amendments of the Senator from Wisconsin to the income-tax section would not be in order until all the committee amendments had been adopted. I think that is right, under the unanimous-consent agreement. Therefore the Senator from Wisconsin has gone to prepare computations for two other amendments that he intends to offer. It is my present intention not to offer any amendment until after the Senator from Wisconsin has offered his two amendments. If they are adopted, I shall not offer mine. Therefore I do not think it would be fair to the Senator from Wisconsin at this time, he having withdrawn for the purpose of making the computation, for me to offer my amendment now.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from North Carolina, for I know he wants to accommodate everybody as far as he can without doing injustice to his bill, if we can not proceed now with the income-tax provision to completion if there are any other provisions in the bill that are yet in dispute and are likely to create some discussion. Under the circumstances, in the absence of my colleague, who has gone away to bid his boy goodbye, who is leaving for France, and who is anxious to be here when this matter is considered, I ask the chairman if he can not, without doing injustice to anybody or himself, proceed with the income-tax provision of the bill whether there are not other disputed items in the bill which we might take up and dispose of?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator, if I can find that we would be in a better position as to the questions that have been left over than we are with respect to this one, I would be glad to take them up. I will inquire whether there is any objection on the part of Senators to taking up the section that relates to postal rates? I do not wish to press the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am sure the Senator does not.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not see the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] in the Senate at the present time, and he is very much interested in that question.

Mr. BANKHEAD. He is here.

Mr. NORRIS. I would not like to have anything done in his absence.

Mr. HARDWICK. I can not agree to take that matter up now. There are certain papers from the department not ready. We might take up the drawback on sugar. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], who is vitally interested in this postal matter, is not present.

Mr. WEEKS. I have some amendments relating to the second-class mail question that I think should be considered, perhaps after the matter to which the Senator from Georgia refers.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think we had better let them come up in regular order.

Mr. WEEKS. Personally I would be very glad to have the subject come up and be disposed of either to-day or to-morrow or very early next week.

Mr. HARDWICK. I would be glad to take up the postal matter on Monday, or any time thereafter.

Mr. SIMMONS. There are only two other things left. There are quite a number of income-tax amendments at the end of the bill. They are amendments to the present income-tax law. We might take up those, and then with the matter relating to postal rates and the drawback upon sugar, I think there is nothing left over except the income-tax provision and the excess-profits tax.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator from Alabama will yield, let me ask the Senator from North Carolina if we can not dispose of the matter of the consumption tax, which includes the drawback on sugar and all questions relating to sugar, coffee, and tea.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it would be very much better to let that go over until after we have finished the income and excess-profits tax.

Mr. HARDWICK. I can see the reason for that contention.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I merely want to inquire of the chairman if there is any reason why we could not take up the amendment relating to taxes at the source? The indication is that there will be considerable discussion on that amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is one amendment in the income-tax amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I know it is a particular feature of it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to taking it up.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I merely made the suggestion in the interest of time, that is all.

Mr. SIMMONS. That will come up in order in connection with the income-tax amendment. The Senate does not seem to be ready to proceed to the consideration of that particular amendment, and as I think it probably will take some little time, I see no reason why we should not adopt that course.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to submit an amendment to the pending bill, and to have it printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I send to the desk two proposed amendments to the bill, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendments will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, my amendment, referred to a moment ago, is really to section 200 of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator's amendment is an original amendment; it is not an amendment to a committee amendment. We are now considering only committee amendments and amendments which are proposed to committee amendments.

Mr. NEW. That is just what I wanted to be set clear on, Mr. President; as to whether my amendment was in order at this time or whether it should properly go over until a later period in the discussion of the bill. I do not want to lose my right to have the amendment considered. If the amendment is not now in order, of course I do not want to take up the time of the Senate with it, but I do not want my amendment to lose its right through any misunderstanding.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senators' amendment is not going to lose its right. As I understand, it is an amendment to the original text of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from North Carolina will pardon the Chair, the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana is an amendment to a committee amendment and is to section 200. If the Senator from North Carolina desires to proceed with the section now, it is undoubtedly in order for the Senator from Indiana to offer his amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Indiana if his amendment is an amendment to the excess-profits tax section of the bill?

Mr. NEW. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I was trying to accommodate the Senator from Alabama by letting that matter go over to-day and to take up something else.

Mr. NEW. My amendment is an amendment fixing the pre-war period.

Mr. SIMMONS. The whole of that title will go over under the ruling of the Chair, if I can find some other portion of the bill for the Senate to consider. The Senator from Indiana is not going to lose his opportunity.

Mr. NEW. I did not so understand the ruling of the Chair. I merely want to have a correct and clear understanding as to the parliamentary status.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say to the Senator from Indiana that his amendment will be in order whenever this title is under consideration; but as the Chair understands, the Senator from North Carolina now desires to pass over this title.

Mr. NEW. That is perfectly satisfactory to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Indiana would now be in order if this title were taken up.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, of course it is impossible for us who are over on this side of the Chamber to hear what is going on on the other side when Senators do not speak above a low tone. When was section 200 passed over?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that by consent of the Senator in charge of the bill and on the request of other Senators he has agreed to pass over the whole title temporarily. The discussion has been going on as to purely hypothetical questions, and the Chair was not called upon to make any ruling whatever.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill is trying to ascertain what particular section he can take up at this time, I would ask if it would be perfectly agreeable to take up and to proceed with the amendments relating to deductions? For instance, on page 101, in lines 12 and 13, I move to strike out the portion of the bill in parentheses. I can see no reason why this subject can not be considered as an entirely separate matter; it relates wholly to deductions. I should like to have it taken up, and I would just as lief have it taken up now as at any other time, if the Senator from North Carolina is delayed in taking up any of the previous sections.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think probably the best thing for us to do is to begin with the income amendments on page 99 and dispose of them as we come to them or of as many of them as we can dispose of as we come to them.

Mr. McCUMBER. I did not quite understand the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I say I think we had better probably commence on page 99 with the income-tax amendments and dispose of that title of the bill in its order.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think we could take that up at this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask the Secretary to resume the reading where he left off when the bill was last under consideration. I think the Senate adopted some of the amendments as we reached them in the title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment suggested.

The SECRETARY. Under Title XII of the income-tax amendments, section 1200 has already been agreed to. At the top of page 101 the committee proposes to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 1201. (1) That paragraphs 2 and 3 of subdivision (a) of section 5 of such act of September 8, 1916, are hereby amended to read as follows:

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, at what point is the Secretary reading?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary is now reading on page 101 and has reached line 7.

Mr. HOLLIS. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether the adoption of these provisions on page 101 would affect Title I, which contains the schedule of war income taxes, or whether they are merely administrative?

Mr. SIMMONS. Some of these provisions are administrative and some of them are not exactly administrative. Most of them, however, merely amend existing law.

The Senator from New Hampshire knows that we retain the income-tax law; that we do not repeal it in this bill; but that a number of amendments are made in this title to that law.

Mr. HOLLIS. Then the adoption of these sections would not in any way preclude the change of the schedules in the war income-tax provision?

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, no.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the amendment.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the amendment, and read as follows:

Second. All interest paid within the year on his indebtedness except on indebtedness incurred for the purchase of obligations or securities the interest upon which is exempt from taxation as income under this title.

Third. Taxes paid within the year imposed by the authority of the United States (except income and war-profits taxes) or of its Territories, or possessions, or any foreign country, or by the authority of any State, county, school district, or municipality, or other taxing subdivision of any State, not including those assessed against local benefits.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, at this point I desire to present an amendment which I suggested in the committee that I would present. That amendment is, on page 101, to strike out, on lines 12 and 13, the words "(except income and war profits taxes)."

Mr. President, the portion within the parentheses, on page 101, is a departure from all previous legislation on the taxation of incomes. It is such a grave departure that I feel that it ought not to be presented until we have a quorum of the Senate present. It is so important to every taxpayer in the United States that I do not desire to present it unless we have as many Senators in the Chamber, if possible, as there are in the city at the present time. Therefore, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	McCumber	Sherman
Bankhead	Hardlug	McKellar	Shields
Beckham	Hardwick	McNary	Simmons
Brady	Hitchcock	Martin	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Hollis	Myers	Smith, Md.
Broussard	Husting	Nelson	Smoot
Calder	James	New	Sterling
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Page	Swanson
Colt	Kellogg	Penrose	Thompson
Culberson	Kendrick	Phelan	Townsend
Curtis	Kenyon	Poindexter	Trammell
Dillingham	King	Pomerene	Vardaman
France	Kirby	Ransdell	Watson
Frelinghuysen	Knox	Saulsbury	Weeks
Gerry	Lewis	Shafroth	Wolcott
Gronna	Lodge	Sheppard

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan] on official business.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. OVERMAN] is detained on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want the serious consideration of the Senate upon a very serious change that has been proposed in the tax law by the committee; a change that was first voted in and then voted out and then voted in again, as I remember. I do not recall by what majority it was finally inserted in the bill.

I desire to call the attention of the Senators to the law of 1916, the law that relates to deductions in determining the net income upon which every citizen making a sufficient net income is required to pay a tax to the Government. Among the deductions which are to be allowed are, of course, all of the ordinary expenses connected with the conduct of business. That includes the amount of interest paid within the year upon such indebtedness as may be owed connected with the business.

The next proposition in the old law reads:

Third. Taxes paid within the year imposed by the authority of the United States, or its Territories, or possessions, or any foreign country, or under the authority of any State, county, school district, or municipality, or other taxing subdivision of any State, not including those assessed against local benefits.

Now, it is clear that the purpose of the law was that the tax should be paid upon net income. Every dollar that was paid out in a given year for taxes, the same as every dollar that was paid out that year for labor or for clerk hire or for interest or for any other purpose pertinent to the business, was deducted from the gross income. Necessarily that which a man must pay in cash during any year must be deducted from that which he receives in any year in order to determine what he has made that year. Now, we have proceeded upon that theory in the law of 1913 and the law of 1916. For some unaccountable reason, which no Senator has yet been able to explain, and which no Senator can possibly explain, either to his own satisfaction or to the satisfaction of anyone else, the committee has made a difference between taxes paid to the Government and taxes paid to a State or municipality. So that in the law which we now present, and for which we ask your consideration, it reads:

Third. Taxes paid within the year imposed by the authority of the United States (except income and war-profits taxes).

In other respects it is exactly the same as in the law of 1913 and the law of 1916; but hereafter you shall not deduct from your expenses anything that you pay to the Government for taxes during any year.

Mr. President, the previous law allowed the taxpayer to deduct, as part of his expenses for any year, all taxes paid during that year, whether they were levied by the United States or by any State or municipality or even by a foreign government. That was reasonable. That was just. In fact, you could not tell what your net income was unless you first deducted everything that you had to pay, including taxes. There is no more reason for excepting from the deduction taxes paid to the United States than there would be for excepting any other taxes. They are part of the expenses paid by the taxpayer, no matter to whom paid.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HOLLIS. Is it the understanding of the Senator that under the law as it now exists the taxpayer may, in order to ascertain his net income, deduct the sum that he will pay——

Mr. McCUMBER. No.

Mr. HOLLIS (continuing). Or the sum that he has paid by way of income tax during the year past?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. HOLLIS. Is that so under the present law?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, certainly; that is the law. I read the law to the Senator. It includes all taxes.

Mr. HOLLIS. Has that been the practice, as the Senator understands?

Mr. McCUMBER. It has been the practice; yes. The provision of the law of 1916 reads:

Fourth. Taxes paid within the year imposed by the authority of the United States—

Let me have the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire, please. He asked me a question, and I want him to listen to the answer.

Mr. HOLLIS. The Senator answered it to my entire satisfaction. Some people have been thrifty enough to do that, the Senator states. I did not know that anyone ever did it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to verify it by the clear declaration of the law. These are the deductions which the law authorizes:

Fourth. Taxes paid within the year imposed by authority of the United States, or of its Territories or possessions, or any foreign country, or the authority of any State or municipality.

And why should it not be so? They are part of your expenses. If you happen to make, exclusive of taxes, $500 a year and your taxes for that year are $500, you have not made anything. You have no net income upon which you can be called upon justly to pay a tax.

Now, let me make this clear. This is, for the first time, a tax upon a tax. In other words, you are compelled to pay a tax upon your expenses, not upon your net income.

Let me elucidate that. Suppose that in the year 1916 a taxpayer has a good business, so profitable that when he makes out his return for the 1916 business—and the return, of course, is made out between January 1 and March 1, I think, in 1917—he finds that he has made a sufficient sum net so that he owes the Government $5,000, and in the month of May—before May 25, I think—he pays that $5,000 to the Government. That $5,000, of course, was paid in 1917. It was part of his expenses of 1917.

Now, suppose that in the year 1917, for any reason, his business has fallen short; and there will be many cases of this kind. I might cite some of the commission men in our grain terminals who made good money last year, and may not make any this year if the exchanges are closed. Suppose that when he makes out his return for his 1917 business—and he has to make that out after January 1, 1918—he finds that he has nothing left as a profit from his business; that he has broken even, or that he runs a little behind. He makes no return on that, does he? He has not made any net profit, and therefore he makes no return; or, if he makes a return, he makes a return that his expenses have equaled his gross income. Then the Government comes and says to him: "Yes, that is true; you have not made a cent this year; you have simply broken even; but you would have made $5,000 had you not paid $5,000 in taxes, and therefore we must tax you upon that $5,000 which you paid." But he remonstrates: "I have not got that $5,000. I paid it to you. I paid it as a part of my expenses." But the Government says: "That does not make any difference. You earned it, and though you paid it to us, and though you did not make a cent, you would have made that much if we had not taxed you, and therefore we insist that you pay us a tax upon the $5,000." But the man says: "I have not got the money to pay you with." "Well, then, sell your property; sell your home; sell anything; you have to pay that, whether you have made a penny or not."

It seems to me, Mr. President, that no more ridiculous proposition could be suggested.

But those who support this proposition say that the taxes paid this year are taxes levied on last year's earnings, and therefore ought not to be deducted from this year's profits. That was the only reason that was given. That assertion falls the moment you apply to it the test of reason.

First—and I want the attention of Senators to this—you could not pay that tax in the year 1916. It was not due in 1916. You did not even know what it would be in 1916. It was no part of your 1916 expenses. Therefore you could not have deducted it from your 1916 expenses, because it was not due and payable, and the law provides that the deduction shall be the amount of taxes that are paid out during that year. It does not make any difference on what it is based, on what the levy may be. The Government might impose a tax, if it saw fit, upon an income you received in the year 1900. The Government might say that you earned a net profit in 1900, 17 years ago, and that they will tax you this year for it. The House tried to do something akin to that in providing for an additional tax on the income of 1916. Those who object to my amendment would say: "Well, I will pay that this year. It is, however, no part of my expenses this year, because it was levied on what I earned 17 years ago, and hence should not be deducted from this year's earnings."

Mr. President, there is nothing in that reasoning. This tax is not a part of the 1916 expenses. It is a part of the 1917 expenses. You are not allowed to deduct, during one calendar year, what you may think you will have to pay the next calendar year. You must deduct from your income of 1917 only what you have actually paid out in 1917.

Second, you can not tell in 1916. I repeat, what you will pay in 1917, and even if you could you would not be allowed to deduct it, as you can not make up your return until after January 31, 1917.

As a matter of fact, in nearly all of the States, if not all of them, the taxes levied upon the assessments, say, of 1916, do not become due until December or January following, and are not delinquent until the March following. Therefore for all practical purposes our taxes become due on March 1, 1917, but they are based on the property that we owned on the 1st day of April, 1916. Now, it never has occurred to anybody in the world that we should not consider them as expenses for this year, because they were levied upon an assessment in the previous year. That is the method of collecting taxes generally. The assessment is made one year. The tax is paid the next year. In the case of the Government taxes the assessment is made in 1915 for a tax which you pay in 1916, and in 1916 for a tax you will pay in 1917.

Mr. President, I think this was very well set out in an editorial in the Washington Post some few days ago—July 12, I think. This editorial I want to read, because it is succinct and to the point. It is headed:

Common sense even in taxation—To make a man pay tax on his taxes is not logical.

That is the heading. It proceeds:

Yesterday in Washington one of the country's ablest business men discussed with Senators and with this writer an extraordinary feature of the new taxation bill—

And it is extraordinary—

Under that bill the Government takes a certain lump sum out of the money earned by an individual or a corporation. It is called "excess-profits tax."

After you have built up your enterprise so that it pays a certain percentage of profit the Government comes in and says, "That will do for the present. I'll take what comes in now for a while."

And the Government takes a lump sum out of what you make. After that, if you make any more, you get it—

He might just as well have applied that to the normal tax and to the tax of the regular income, irrespective of the excess tax, because it applies to all—

Intelligent business men do not object to this part of the new law. They recognize that somebody must pay the Nation's bills. Those that are making the biggest profit can reasonably be expected to pay a fair share to the Nation out of their profits, provided energy and enterprise be not unfairly discouraged.

But very unreasonable and difficult to understand is one particular feature of the bill. What you pay to the Government in tax you actually are not permitted to deduct from your net earnings; in other words, after the Government has taken a lump sum out of your profits you must still pay income tax to the Government on the money that the Government has taken from you.

The Government says, "Give me that $10 that you just earned." You pay the $10 as ordered. Then if the income tax happens to be 25 per cent the Government says, "Now that you have given me the $10, give me two dollars and a half for income tax on the $10 you gave me."

If there is logic of any kind in the idea of making a man pay a tax on his taxes, we are not able to see it.

A man deducts from his income statement expenses necessary to his business. Surely, the money that the Government takes out of his enterprise is an expense necessary in running the enterprise. For the Government to take this money and then say, "Pay me a tax on what I have just taken" is from every sane point of view too silly for discussion.

It is not a question as to the amount that the Government will take or as to the amount of income tax on net income that the Government will demand.

The people of the United States must pay the Government's bills, whatever those bills may be.

Government debt is a debt on every man's house, coat, hat, and business, and real estate.

It is desirable, however, in these times of heavy taxation that will grow heavier, for the Government to show careful common sense, fairness, and freedom from arbitrary action in its taxation methods.

There is not common sense or fairness in the proposal to add an income tax to a tax.

This newspaper heartily indorses the opposition that the business man mentioned has made to this illogical proposition in discussing the question with leading Senators.

Let the Government take what it wants, but take it in a common-sense, logical way.

Mr. President, I have stated the only position which I remember as having been taken by those who said we ought to except the tax paid to the Government; and that seemed to me to be based wholly upon the idea that the tax that we are paying is really a tax on an assessment made in 1916, and it is not on the business of this year, 1917. The answer to that is that all taxes are paid exactly in that way, upon a previous assessment, but we make out our returns for either a fiscal or a calendar year, and the expenses that come within that fiscal or calendar year ought to be deducted whether they be expenses incurred by reason of supporting the Government or expenses incurred by reason of supporting the State.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the committee went very fully into the argument presented by the Senator from North Dakota, and, I think, with practical unanimity disagreed with him. It seems to be true that under the language of the old income-tax law this deduction has been sometimes made; but it was a great surprise, I think, to the committee that it could be made. Nobody contemplated such a deduction under the existing law when it was framed. We did not think of deducting from net income the income tax on net income.

Now, let us see just what the situation is. We are proposing by this bill to take an income tax from the income of 1917.

Mr. McCUMBER. The net income of 1917.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And from the war profits of 1917. Let me take the munition plants of 1917 as an illustration. We say to them that you are to pay us approximately under this bill from 12 to 65 per cent of your war profits, and that you shall deduct from that part of your war profits of 1917 this tax. That is what we say in this bill. We may strike it out of this bill and put it 40 or 50 per cent flat on all war profits—the same to everybody. Suppose we say in the bill we wish 50 per cent of your war profits made in 1917, and the company makes one hundred million of war profits, as some have and will. We say then, in the bill, $50,000,000 of that income of 1917 is to go into the National Treasury as an assessment against you for the war profits of 1917. We are going to take one-half of that $100,000,000 of war profits which you make in 1917. As a matter of necessity, we can not determine the war profits until the end of the year 1917, so we will not take that $50,000,000 until a little later in 1918, but half of the war profits of 1917 we are taking, not as an assessment against you on what you make for 1918 but as half of the profits made in 1917, though you do not turn them over to us until some time in 1918, they are the profits of 1917 that you owe and hold for the Government.

Now, this is the proposition of the Senator from North Dakota, that though the company made $100,000,000 in 1917, and though the law provided that the company should turn $50,000,000 over to the Government, half of those war profits of 1917 we do not collect until 1918. The company may make $100,000,000 more of war profits in 1918. The Senator from North Dakota proposes that we shall only regard the company as making $50,000,000 net profits in 1918, when it really makes $100,000,000. That is the proposition that the committee decline to uphold. The language now in the bill is to protect the National Treasury against a deduction from the net income of 1918 of the tax for 1917.

It is true that we get this $50,000,000 out of the profits of 1917 in 1918, but it is the profits of 1917 that we are taking, and then when the company makes $100,000,000 of excess profits again in 1918 we wish to collect $50,000,000 from the profits of 1918. We will collect the part due the Government from the profits of 1918 in 1919 as a matter of convenience and a matter of necessity, but it will still be a part of 1918 profits collected.

Mr. WEEKS. May I ask the Senator from Georgia what the situation would be if the company did not make any profits in 1918?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There would be no assessment.

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator has been discussing taking $50,000,000 out of the earnings of 1917 and 1918.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I did not.

Mr. WEEKS. That is what I understood.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not. I drew a distinction between the view presented by the Senator from North Dakota and the real situation. We assess that $50,000,000 out of the income of 1917, and we expect them to turn it over to us at the time we provide for it to be turned over in 1918. It will be turned over to us in 1918, and it will be turned over whether the company makes any profit in 1918 or not. The profits of 1918 have nothing to do with turning half the profits of 1917 over to the Government.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to state to the Senator from Georgia another case and ask him what he would do in that contingency. I will preface it by the statement that it might be reached by another amendment. Suppose a partnership in 1917 makes $200,000. Under the bill, whether it is distributed or not, the entire $200,000 is charged as net profit to the individual members, and they must pay an income tax upon it. Now, suppose the same year, 1917, they must pay $50,000 of that $200,000 as an excess-profits tax. Under the bill they still must pay an income tax on what they have already paid the Government as an excess-profits tax, although they never will receive it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think the Senator correctly construes the bill. I think you will find later on in the bill a provision assessing the income tax, which requires—that in assessing income tax the net income embraced in the return shall also be credited with the amount of any war-profits tax imposed by the act of Congress and assessed for the same calendar or fiscal year upon the taxpayer.

Mr. KELLOGG. On what page is that found?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. On page 122. But that really is not the question I am now discussing. If there would be any unfairness in the adjustment of the partnership payment and the individual payment that we should correct, I think you will find it is provided for. I know it was the intention to put in a provision that would guard against any such inequality.

Mr. KELLOGG. That may be true. I just asked the Senator the question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think that has been done. The effort has been made to guard against every injustice of that character. It has been done; but I wish to discuss the proposed amendment of the Senator from North Dakota rather than to discuss further the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota.

Now, let us get it clearly in our minds that the income tax is an assessment against part of a yearly income. It occupies a different position from most taxes. It is a part of the net profits of the corporation or the individual for a particular year. We call on them for a part of their net profits for 1917. We make the calculation and get the part of those net profits a little later on, but we say that it is the net profits of 1917 that we are having turned over to the Government. It should not be carried as a charge against the business in 1918. It is not; it is a part of the liability for 1917.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator state what year it should be charged against after you paid it? When the Senator answers that he has got at the real crux of this situation, and until the Senator answers it——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It ought to be charged against 1917.

Mr. McCUMBER. But on what will he deduct it? As a part of his profit for what year?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is a part of his profit of 1917.

Mr. McCUMBER. But when he pays——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He pays a per cent of the profit of 1917.

Mr. McCUMBER. But if he pays out $50 or $50,000 or $50,000,000, he pays it out as he gets some profit somewhere and at some time. Now, when will he start that tax against his profit? What year will he charge it against his profit?

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. It seems to me the action of the committee is so plain that it can not be questioned. If the profits of 1917 are $100,000 and the Government's tax upon those profits is $5,000, the $100,000 does not belong to the individual or the corporation; there is only $95,000 of net profits; the corporation is not entitled to the other $5,000. Under the law the Government is entitled to the $5,000. But the Government of the United States says that until its officials can check up and see whether the companies' return is correct or not the company may hold that $5,000 and can pay it any time before the 31st day of May following. The $100,000 did not belong to the individual or corporation; $5,000 belonged to the Government of the United States. That is why there should not be allowed a deduction.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It does not belong to the business of 1918 at all. It is ours out of the business of 1917. The company can not distribute it as profits to stockholders. If an effort to distribute the whole of the income to stockholders was going on, they could be stopped before doing it by the court upon the theory that it was a fund which belonged to the United States. We assess a part of the profits of 1917, and as soon as they are ascertained and we have the opportunity to satisfy ourselves that their calculations and their bookkeeping are honest and correct and that they cover all, we take it out of the 1917 income. Then we take the account of their business for 1918 and take our part out of that.

Let us see what would be the consequence if the suggestion of the Senator from North Dakota prevailed. Here is a corporation, an ammunition plant, that makes $100,000,000 of war profits in 1917. Fifty per cent of it belongs to the Government under this bill if it becomes a law. Fifty million dollars would belong to the Government out of the profits of 1917 and their final net profits for 1917 would only be $50,000,000 after the income tax is paid. Now, next year they make $100,000,000 more. We make them turn over to us this $50,000,000 of 1917 at a period in 1918, and the Senator from North Dakota, although they made $100,000,000 more in 1918, desires to deduct that $50,000,000 and say they have made but $50,000,000 in 1918. He would thus cut the tax more than half in two for 1918. The proposition would break down the whole plan of the bill and take out of the Treasury a very large part that we expect the bill to raise.

Now, then, they have had two years with profits of $100,000,000 each and they paid taxes of $50,000,000 on one year and $25,000,000 or less would be paid the second year, according to the amendment of the Senator. The committee was surprised that any such construction was placed upon the old income tax. We regarded the income tax as a part of the net profits of the year that were chargeable to that year and not to the income of the year when we collected it. When we found there was doubt about it we put language into the bill to protect the Treasury from the doubt, and it is a motion to strike out that language which is now pending before the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, no legerdemain of words, no attempt to create any character of prejudice by talking about hundreds of millions and great corporations, can by any possibility hide the real facts in this case; nor can any assumption that the committee were astonished that they had made a law one year before and four years before in which they very carefully stated that taxes were taxes no matter to whom they were paid, no matter who exacted them; that taxes were a part of necessary expenses in one year, hide the naked fact that what you pay in taxes is not net income. The committee could certainly not escape the charge of a lapse of memory if they were astonished when they wrote into a previous law under "deductions," taxes paid within the year, imposed by the authority of the United States, should be deducted; they did not mean that they should be deducted, and that it was a source of great surprise to this intellectual committee that it had written that fact into the law of 1912 and 1916.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is not the Senator from North Dakota the only member of the committee who has claimed that construction of deductions in the statute?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not go into the private accounts of any Senator. He keeps them himself.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator was criticizing my suggestion that they were surprised.

Mr. McCUMBER. I say I do not go into the private accounts of any Senator. I simply know what the law is, and if I make out my returns I am liable to make them out in accordance with the law, with no attempt to hide anything and with an effort to pay the Government every dollar that is coming to the Government under the law. If there is any Senator whose wealth is so great that the taxes that he pays amount to nothing to him and that he can well afford to give the Government that much extra, all right. Neither am I concerning myself regarding the hundreds of millions that are paid by the corporations. The principal amount of this money is paid by people having an income ranging from $1,000 up to $30,000 a year.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then I will ask the Senator——

Mr. McCUMBER. They are the persons who will be affected by any injustice that you write into the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then I ask the Senator this question, if the short sentence which he has just uttered has been concluded. Did any other Senator on the committee entertain the view of the old law, and did the Senator call attention to it?

Mr. McCUMBER. I would not have insulted the intelligence of any Senator on the committee by asking him whether he understood a law which allowed a deduction for taxes imposed by the Government to mean a deduction of taxes imposed by the Government, and if the Senator failed to entertain that view he simply failed to read the law.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That was not the question I asked the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is not going to escape his argument by assuming that we did not understand the law as it read. Nobody was astonished. The committee that wrote that law before knew what it was, and they knew the reason for the law. Now, why not exclude the taxes paid to the State? Why do you not exclude the taxes paid to the municipality? They are paid by people or corporations that earn millions and hundreds of millions of dollars. Why did you vote to deduct those taxes in making their reports for net income? You know you would have gotten a larger revenue if you had not deducted them. The Senator knows as well as I know that there is no more sense in excluding taxes paid to a State than excluding those paid to the Government. A tax is a tax. It is the amount imposed upon the citizen for the protection of his State government and his Federal Government. It is as much his expense as his expense for clerical hire, or for any other character of expense paid by him.

Now, the Senator very carefully hugs the argument between two lines. He is careful not to go back of 1916 nor ahead of 1918. The corporation under the law of 1916 has paid its 1917 tax. That was based upon its 1916 earnings. It is not asked to take that out of the 1916 expenses. The Senator's argument is that you ought not to take it out of the 1917 expenses, because it was an expense paid under a 1916 levy. Therefore I ask the Senator in good faith, what would you take it out of? Where would you take it out? You could not take it out of 1916, although it was not based upon the 1916 levy.

This amendment is not asking, and the Senator can not fail to comprehend that it is not asking, that the sum paid this year be taken out of this year. It is not taken out of what he will pay this year. What he pays in income tax this year is not on the 1917 assessment; it is on the 1916 assessment. What he pays next year will not be on the 1918 assessment, it will be on the 1917 assessment. Now, drop your millionaires and your billionaires for a minute and come down to the average man in business, and then say whether it is just that you should make that man pay a tax upon an expense; and that is just what you do. I know a business that last year made enough so that it paid nearly $5,000 in taxes. I know that the same business this year will only about break even. Now, when did it pay that $5,000? It paid it last May. When will it make out its return? It will make it out next January or from January up to next March. What will that return contain? It will contain the statement that the gross earnings of that company for the year 1917 were a certain amount. What else will it contain? It will contain a statement that the expenses and the taxes, including the taxes paid to the United States, were so much and the two about balance. Now comes the Government—not in 1917 but in 1918, after this business has presented its balance sheet to the Government. The Government will say, "Yes; your balance sheet does show that you have not made a cent on your 1917 business"; and the Government will further say, "We know you have not made one cent, but we collected $5,000 of taxes from you. If we had not collected those taxes from you, you would have made $5,000. Therefore pay the tax on that $5,000. You pay one-third or half of it or 25 per cent of it." The manager answers, "I have not got that money because I paid it to you once, and I can not pay you out of the money that I paid to you." Is that an unreasonable suggestion on his part? The Government says, "We have got to have it. We will sell your house, sell your business; you have got to raise that money, whether you made it or not." And so, Mr. President, this ceases to be a tax on net incomes and becomes a tax upon expense or a tax upon a tax paid. Now, no character of argument can get around that fact. Of course, the Government will make more out of this man if it makes him pay whether he earns it or not. I am talking of 1918 because this tax will go into the tax statement that is made in 1918. It may be that in 1918 he will make money again and pay an income tax.

Now, the point that I tried to make clear is that your taxes and expenses—I do not care what time it is paid—can not be paid for 1916 except in 1917 on the 1917 return. Therefore the present law rightly says it is a part of your expense for that year.

Now, the two Houses of Congress were not all of them insane when they enacted the 1913 and 1916 laws. They were not all crazy when they passed the two previous bills. There was just as much reason, as they knew, for allowing a deduction of Federal taxes as there was for a deduction of any other taxes. The only tax that they excepted and therein showed that they did use sane reasoning upon it was a tax charged against a local benefit, because, they said, "If you get a benefit equivalent to that tax you have lost nothing. You have simply paid for a benefit received. Therefore you can not deduct taxes charged against a local benefit." I made out my returns last year. I did not include in the taxes anything charged for the bridge on Q Street, though it was paid, although I do not know that I got any particular benefit; but I was not allowed to do so and ought not to have done so.

So, Mr. President, it may be that by an unjust rule you will get more taxes than you would if you applied a just rule, but there is no more reason why you should compel a party to pay a tax when he does not make a cent after deducting all his taxes than you should adopt a rule that taxes him without reference to whether he makes an income or not.

Mr. President, we can vote as we see fit on this question, but it nevertheless becomes a gross injustice to the average taxpayer, not the one who is earning millions, because he can stand it.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. LEWIS. May I say to the Senator I was detained out of the Chamber when the Senator began his address and I am ignorant of the way the Senator feels that his amendment would operate? Would the Senator be so good, unless it imposes on him an unnecessary trouble, to say to me in what way, in his judgment, the amendment tendered by him would relieve the evil, assuming it exists, such as he has described?

Assume the evil to exist as the Senator describes it, will the Senator be so good as to let me know how he feels that his amendment would cure it?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, very simply, by allowing the taxpayer to deduct all of his necessary expenses from his gross income. Could there be anything more simple or could there be anything more just than that?

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator assume, therefore, in this proposition that it is to be left to each taxpayer himself to be the judge as to what are his necessary expenses?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly not. The law declares what are his necessary expenses; and the law declares that taxes paid are necessary expenses.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator assume, therefore—which is no doubt the crux of it—that the tax that was levied on him the year before but which was paid in that particular year is to be treated as a necessary expense of his business?

Mr. McCUMBER. Why, not of that year, because it is not paid in that year; but certainly taxes that are paid in a given year constitute a part of one's expenses for that year in which by law one is compelled to pay them. They can not be charged in any other year except the year in which they are paid.

Mr. LEWIS. I catch the Senator's point.

Mr. McCUMBER. Every State has a taxing system of its own. I think most of them levy their real estate taxes and their personal taxes upon the property which one owns on the 1st day of April of each year. That tax, however, will not become due or even payable until the following December, and ordinarily there is no penalty attached until the succeeding March; sometimes it is February, sometimes it is March; but in all instances, especially in the agricultural States of the North, taxes are paid the year after the assessment is made; they are not paid during the same year. They are, however, a part of a man's expenses. It is a little different as to Government taxes, because one can not pay the Government taxes at any other time but has to pay them in the year in which they are levied, and in that year only.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I was not in the Chamber when the Senator from North Dakota began his address, and I should like to ask him whether it is his contention that an income tax which a person pays, say in May of this year, should be permitted to be charged as an expense for this year?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And that the tax which will fall due next May should be charged as an expense next May?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator that in making out my income tax I have always done that. Whatever the date is of the check that is when I consider the tax paid, and that is when I take credit for the payment of the tax. I supposed there was no contention upon the part of anyone that that was the proper way to do it.

Mr. McCUMBER. There is none, and there has been none.

Mr. SHAFROTH. What is the contention on the other side?

Mr. McCUMBER. The contention now is that it is desirable to change the law so that one may deduct any of his other expenses, but that taxes paid to the Government must be treated differently from taxes paid to the State. In other words, that one can not deduct the taxes paid to the Government at all; that is the point. Even though the taxes are paid and after they are paid and the returns are made it is ascertained that no net income at all has been made, still the tax would be imposed upon the amount which had been paid to the Government.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Is it the contention that if the net profits are $100,000 in a given year the tax paid in that year is not to be deducted?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is correct.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That it can not be deducted at all at any time?

Mr. McCUMBER. At no time. The tax can not be deducted the year before, because it was not paid in that year, and it can not be deducted the year after, because it was not paid during that year. It can not be deducted this year, because the tax this year is based upon last year's assessment, upon the business of last year; in other words, there can not be deducted as expenses a dollar which is paid to the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I would ask, as but few Senators are present, that this matter may be passed over without voting on it at the present time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that will be the order.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to speak upon it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, under the taxes imposed under the first income-tax law, and even under the amendment to that law of September 8, 1916, the rates of taxes were so low that few in the United States thought of deducting from income any taxes which they had paid to the Government. In fact, I must admit my ignorance of the law. I never thought of deducting the amount of income taxes I paid to the Government by claiming an exemption for them in making my annual income returns. Really, Mr. President, the money did not belong to me. If a corporation was subject to a tax of a hundred thousand dollars during the year 1916, the directors of that corporation knew that the company was not entitled to that $100,000; that it did not belong to the corporation; it did not belong to the stockholders; but that it did belong to the Government of the United States. The mere fact that the income-tax law permitted the payment of the tax imposed the May following does not in any way, shape, or form relieve the company's obligation to the Government as of the 31st day of December of the year 1916. In other words, if the directors of the company had paid that money out by way of dividends or distributed it in any way, it would have been paying money out that did not belong to the company, but which belonged to the Government of the United States. Mr. President, now that the rates of taxation are to be so high, all Senators must know that if the committee amendment is not agreed to the amount of the estimated revenue under this bill would be reduced nearly one-third.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. Supposing one individual has an income of $2,000,000 under the law, and we say the tax upon $2,000,000 is 50 per cent; that would be $1,000,000; but if the words as reported by the committee are stricken out, that individual would be allowed to deduct $1,000,000, and, of course, the amount to be paid will only be 25 per cent of the $2,000,000, instead of 50 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to approach the question in another way. I am speaking of all the revenue to be derived from the bill as a whole, whether on small or large incomes. I repeat that if the amendment is stricken out it will make a difference of nearly one-third in the amount of revenue that would be collected under the bill.

For instance, the rates of taxation now proposed on war profits and upon incomes are so high that if deductions were allowed of the amount of tax paid under both of those titles I do know that it would take more than one-half the revenues expected to be derived by this bill, as far as the large war profits and large incomes are concerned.

The Senator from Georgia simply referred to the war profits. In the case just cited by the Senator from North Dakota, where the income of a corporation is $2,000,000, under this bill we will take more than $1,000,000 of it.

Mr. PENROSE. Does the Senator refer to individual incomes?

Mr. SMOOT. No; to corporation incomes. From such a corporation as that referred to we will take more by the war-profits tax than $1,000,000. Not only that, but when the other $1,000,000 is distributed to the stockholders of the company under this bill we take another percentage from that income of the individual stockholder. It all depends upon how much that may be and upon the deductions allowed as to what the tax may be; but take it for granted that it is only 25 per cent. Then on that $1,000,000 there is another 25 per cent deduction, making a total deduction of $1,250,000.

Mr. President, the next year that same company may again make $2,000,000, but if the committee amendment is stricken from the bill the company would deduct one million and a quarter of dollars, leaving only $750,000 to be subject to taxation instead of $2,000,000.

The proposal to strike out the words "except income and war profits" can not be defended; it is not just. The individual or corporation doing business knows just what taxes will be imposed upon his business, and they are included in the prices for which he sells his goods; they are figured in as a part of the cost of his merchandise; and now it is actually proposed to relieve him of part of the tax, and all that he has added to cover cost he makes clear if this exemption is allowed. Mr. President, there is no business man when he marks the price at which his goods shall be sold but takes into consideration every possible cost, including the taxes upon his business for the year. If he did not do so, he would fail.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I was not present when the discussion of this amendment started, but section 1201 provides:

(1) That paragraphs 2 and 3 of subdivision (a) of section 5 of such act of September 8, 1916, are hereby amended to read as follows:

Does that relate to all incomes?

Mr. SMOOT. That relates to all incomes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is, incomes of individuals as well as of corporations?

Mr. SMOOT. It relates to all kinds of incomes, whether of individuals, partnerships, or corporations.

Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Colorado that the words the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] is undertaking to strike out of the bill are found on page 101, line 12, the words being "(except income and war profits taxes)." Subsection 3 of section 1201 of the present law reads exactly as this paragraph reads, with the exception that the committee have put in parentheses the words "except income and war profits taxes."

Mr. SHAFROTH. In other words, under the law as it exists now a man would have a perfect right to deduct the amount of taxes which he had paid to the Government on his income?

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And the idea of putting those words in is to change that rule and so provide that they shall not be allowed the deduction for that amount?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has stated it correctly. As I have said, unless the words remain in the bill we might just as well begin to rewrite the bill if we intend to raise the necessary revenue by this form of taxation.

Why, Mr. President, take a corporation that makes $1,000,000 this year, 75 per cent of which is taken by the Government in the form of war profits and income taxes. Suppose that the next year the same corporation makes a net profit of $750,000. Under the contention of the Senator from North Dakota that corporation could deduct the $750,000 paid in taxes for the preceding year and would not be required to pay a cent of taxation for the second year, although it had made $750,000.

It is for these reasons, Mr. President, that the committee not only thought it wise but absolutely necessary to amend the law by including the words which the Senator from North Dakota seeks to strike out.

Mr. President, it does sound rather strange to say that we are imposing a tax upon a tax, as the Senator from North Dakota contends; but the money which has been made to pay the taxes provided for in this bill does not belong to the corporation, but belongs to the Government of the United States.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator another question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. What is the language of the law of Great Britain, for instance, in relation to this matter? Are individuals and corporations there allowed to deduct the amount which they have paid as taxes to the English Government the preceding year?

Mr. SMOOT. I would not want to say offhand, because I do not remember; but I believe I am safe in saying that they are not allowed to deduct in computing their taxes the amount paid in taxes to the Government the preceding year. In fact, Mr. President, in 1890 and 1891 I was in England and that far back was compelled to make out an income-tax return. I know that at that time it was not permitted to deduct from the income of a corporation any tax paid to England on its income the preceding year; and I presume the law is the same now as then, although I do not state it as a positive fact.

The Senator from North Dakota was mistaken when he said that this amendment allowed the deduction of all Government-paid taxes. It only applies to the income tax and the war-profits tax and the amendment so states. I think there is quite a difference between allowing a tax paid to the Government to be deducted from the succeeding tax return and allowing the individual or the corporation to deduct the tax paid to the State, to the county, or the school district, or any other taxes that are not for a permanent improvement to property.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator another question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield further to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator has said that if this provision is not retained in the bill—that is, if the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota prevails—we might really have to rewrite the bill. Can the Senator state how much, in his judgment, the bill would be affected in its revenue-producing qualities by the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. This year it would not be affected in that respect very largely, but next year I am quite sure the revenue would be 33⅓ per cent less than estimated. In other words, I have no doubt in my mind that the war taxes and the income taxes, covering the whole United States, individuals, partnerships, and corporations, will amount to one-third of all the profits that will be made, and therefore I say that the following year the revenue produced by the law would be affected to that amount.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask the Senator from Utah whether the committee has or whether he has any estimate of the profits made in the country?

Mr. SMOOT. I can tell the Senator just what they are. I think I have the figures here. The profits for 1913 were $3,832,104,410.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Do those figures cover the profits of corporations?

Mr. SMOOT. They cover all profits under the returns that have been made under the taxation law of 1909 and 1913 and amendments thereto. In 1914 the profits were $4,339,550,000; in 1915 they were $3,619,387,000; in 1916 they were $5,184,482,000; and it is estimated now that for the year 1917, based upon the statements that we have seen published in the press of some of the largest companies in the United States for the first and second quarters of this year that the amount will be $8,100,000,000.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And the Senator's view is that one-third of that will be taken for taxation.

Mr. SMOOT. Not one-third of the $8,100,000,000, but one-third of the war profits; that is the average profits for the prewar years; in other words, for the years 1911, 1912, and 1913 the average prewar profits were about $3,930,000,000. Taking the $3,930,000,000 from $8,100,000,000 leaves about $4,000,000,000, and I am quite sure, I will say to the Senator, that if the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota is adopted it will reduce by one-quarter the taxes upon that amount.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Then, the Senator thinks, of course, that this bill will not raise sufficient revenue?

Mr. SMOOT. It is impossible, if we agree to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota. In that event we will have to raise more revenue from other sources.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It seems to me purely a question of expediency as to whether or not we want to raise this amount of taxes by excepting the payments that are made to the Government. I do not see that there is any injustice in it when we understand what this provision is.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that I do not think there is any injustice in it. I do not believe that a man who pays a tax to the Government of the United States out of his income of 1916 should claim exemption the following year. He owed it to the Government on the 31st day of December of that year.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is a question of expediency. If we want to raise it in that way and specify that it shall not be exempt, then, of course, it is proper to do so.

Mr. SMOOT. It is entirely with Congress.

Mr. FLETCHER and Mr. LEWIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield first to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I merely want to ask the Senator a question. Speaking in regard to the average profits in 1911, 1912, and 1913, he referred to them as being something over $3,000,000,000, and the estimated profits for 1917 I believe he said would be something like $8,000,000,000. The difference between those two amounts would be what may be called "war profits."

Mr. SMOOT. They are the war profits under the bill, and those are the profits that we are undertaking now to reach by the war-profits tax.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will allow me, I return to the proposition presented by the Senator from North Dakota, because I am confused by the designation in his argument. May I ask the Senator, from his experience, if a corporation has a million dollars in its treasury and declares a dividend to its stockholders of $100,000, but nevertheless the stockholders allow the money declared to them to remain in the treasury of the company, is not that money the property of the stockholders after it has been voted to them in the form of dividends? It is not the company's property, as I understand, after it has been set aside as a dividend, and a tax on that would not be a tax laid on the company's property; the tax on that would be a tax on the stockholder who could have drawn it whenever he pleased, would it not?

Mr. SMOOT. When this bill passes the Government will tax that money before it can be distributed to the stockholders, and then after it is distributed to the stockholders the Government will collect an income tax upon that received by the individual stockholder of the already taxed corporation.

Mr. LEWIS. Then I ask the Senator when, to use the illustration he gave, the profit is $100,000 and a $50,000 tax is due on it—true, not to be paid until 1918, but charged as an obligation to the Government—how is that $50,000 the property of the company by which it could be the subject of a tax?

Mr. SMOOT. It is not the property of the company; it is the property of the Government of the United States, as I have said. The Senator is perfectly right.

Mr. LEWIS. Therefore it is not the subject of tax, and therefore it is not a tax upon a tax.

Mr. SMOOT. No. All they pay is upon the net profits. But now the senior Senator from North Dakota wants whatever tax there may be collected to be deducted the following year from the profits of that year.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to ascertain whether I be right in my understanding of the Senator's contention. After this debt is due for 1917, it is the property of the Government, although the Government may not collect it until 1918. Therefore it is not the property of the citizen or the company to be the subject of a tax; it is practically the property of the Government, though the Government may not have collected it.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. It seems to me, therefore, that the position taken by the Senator from North Dakota that it is a tax upon a tax has no real foundation, because you can not tax that tax because it is not the property of the former holder; it has passed practically into the possession of the person who is to enjoy it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator takes the same position that I do in relation to the matter.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator agree with me?

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. It seems to me that relieves the situation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will my colleague permit me to make an inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to his colleague?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. KING. Was the estimate of the committee as to the revenue which would be derived from the war-profits tax based upon the assumption that the profits of corporations for the year 1916 would be $8,100,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. The bill as reported to the Senate is based upon the supposition that the profits this year will be $8,000,000,000.

Mr. KING. The reason I make the inquiry is that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] the other day in his speech averred that the profits would be $9,000,000,000, and I was wondering which basis was selected as the one upon which the calculations offered by the committee was predicated.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to my colleague that the estimate, of course, is very indefinite. Some think that the amount will be $9,000,000,000. It is my opinion that if the Government is to regulate the prices charged by the steel corporations of the country, by the coal corporations of the country, by those who distribute fuel to the consumers, and if farm products are to be regulated as to price, the estimate of $8,000,000,000 will be quite high enough, and any estimate made above $8,000,000,000, I think, will fail in raising the amount of revenue expected.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if my colleague will pardon me, I think he is entirely correct. I have been making some calculations myself, and I reached the conclusion that probably the profits would not reach eight billions, but certainly would not exceed them, in view of the regulatory policy which will be adopted by the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. Mr. President, I want to say that in my opinion the $8,000,000,000 will be the very limit of the profits for the year 1917.

It seems to me that this matter is so clear that there is hardly any necessity of discussing it any further; and I believe I will say no more, unless some Senator desires to ask a question.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, before we vote upon this particular section I wish to call the attention of Senators to the extreme importance of this provision in the bill which the Senator from North Dakota, who is a member of the committee, would strike out. My recollection is—I may be mistaken about that—that in the committee we gave very thorough consideration to the suggestion which the Senator from North Dakota now makes. My recollection is that, with the exception of that Senator, the committee was unanimously in favor of the provision as it is written in the bill.

The principle seemed to us to be a very clear one. There are some little complications in understanding it, growing out of the fact that the tax which is based upon the income of the calendar year 1917 is not actually paid until June, 1918; but brushing away those trifles, which are mere complications that affect the understanding of the question, I think the question which is presented to the Senate is this: After the taxpayer has paid his tax due in June, 1918, shall we permit him, when he goes to pay his tax in 1919, to deduct from his income the amount of the tax that he paid in the previous year?

I think that is the only question involved. It is exactly the same question that might be presented with reference to taxation in the States. The States impose certain taxes upon their citizens for the year 1918. We will say that those taxes are due and payable at the end of that year, in December, 1918. When those taxes are paid, I think, under the custom and practices of all the States, that transaction is considered as closed. That is the end of it. The citizen owed the Government so much tax for that year. He paid that tax. Now, the proposition of the Senator from North Dakota is that when that same citizen comes to pay his tax in 1919, he shall be permitted to deduct from his taxable income, for the purpose of ascertaining the tax he should pay, the tax which he paid the State in the previous year.

I do not think any State permits that. I do not see any reason why the Government should permit that. In this scheme of internal taxation that we have developed here, we allow the citizen a great many different kinds of exemptions. When he goes to pay his income tax he is permitted to deduct any tax that he has paid to the State and any tax that he has paid to the Government in that year. He is permitted to deduct from his income any tax that he may have paid by virtue of the excess profits tax that we have levied upon him. After he has made all of those deductions—and they cover everything, not only taxes but insurance, and interest, and certain losses, and the excess profits tax—after he has made all of those deductions, his final tax under this scheme is that which he pays upon his income. He pays that from March 1 to June 25. That is his final tax. Your committee thought that ended the transaction; that closed up the matter for that year; but the Senator from North Dakota does not agree to that.

The Senator from North Dakota says that next year, when he gets ready to pay his final tax, his income tax, he must be allowed a deduction from his income equal to the amount of money that he pays in taxes for the previous year. To my mind, the proposition is very simple; but it would be a very serious matter, so far as the revenues of the Government are concerned, if we were to allow that to be done.

The income tax that will be paid under the present law and under this bill as it was presented by the committee, and as it was amended here day before yesterday, will amount to about $1,300,000,000 for the fiscal year 1917; so that in the next year, when the taxpayers come to pay their taxes, they would be entitled to deduct from the net incomes of the Nation the enormous sum of $1,300,000,000. The tax upon that amount, roughly calculated, based altogether upon a general average—for we can not get at it except in that way—is based upon a general average of about 25 per cent. I think that is what the general average of the income-tax rate would be under the present law and the bill as it now stands, between 23 and 25 per cent. It would amount to something near $300,000,000; and that is the amount of revenue to this Government involved in the proposition of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina also inform us how much more we would save if we should also except the State and municipal taxes? Of course you would save something; but will the Senator tell us why we should not also except the State taxes and save that much more?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have just stated—I do not know whether the Senator was present or not—that the idea of the committee was that when a man pays his taxes for this year, that is the end of that transaction, and that in no State, so far as I know, do they permit that man the next year to deduct the tax that he paid for the previous year, and I do not see why that should be the case with the United States.

Mr. McCUMBER. It would depend upon whether the State has an income tax or not. We have been doing it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I know we have been doing it, and I think we have been very improperly doing it.

Mr. McCUMBER. What would the Senator do with a case like that which I mentioned, where a person one year, on the 1916 basis, this year pays the Government $5,000? Of course it is based on last year's assessment, but he pays it in 1917. Then suppose, when he makes out his return in 1918 prior to paying his tax of 1917 in 1918, he finds that he has just broken even; that he has made nothing at all. Would the Senator still insist that he should pay a tax on his expenses because part of the expenses were paid to the Government?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not see any parallel between expenses and taxes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Are not taxes an expense?

Mr. SIMMONS. We allow a man to take out all of his expenses. We allow him to take out all of his taxes until he comes to his last final tax. When he comes to the last final tax, which is the income tax, all of these other taxes finally converging into that, that tax represents all of his property with all of his deductions. He pays it. The committee thinks that is the end of that transaction.

Mr. McCUMBER. I believe that some of the States have income taxes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know of any. I know my State does not.

Mr. McCUMBER. If he pays his income tax to the State, he deducts it just the same. It is a tax. It is money paid out.

Why, Mr. President, it is just a simple proposition. You will get more money if you have a mind to be unjust; but the argument so far seems to have been based upon the assumption that if you get $50,000,000 in taxes this year, and you allow that to be deducted from the income of the parties who pay the taxes in their next year's return, the Government has lost that $50,000,000. Of course the Government will lose the tax that will have been paid upon the $50,000,000 if you are not allowed to deduct it as part of your expenses; but, Mr. President, I think it is far better that we have a sufficient income tax. I want to say to the Senator from North Carolina and to the Senator from Georgia if we need more of an income tax, then let us levy a greater income tax; but for heaven's sake let us not attempt to levy an income tax when there is no income upon which it can be levied. Let us not attempt to levy it upon expenses and call those expenses income simply because we will get more if we levy it upon those expenses. Increase your income-tax rates, if they are not sufficient, but do not tax the party who has made nothing, who has no income, upon a portion of his expenses because that portion of the expenses was paid to the Government of the United States.

That is practically all there is in it, Mr. President.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I think the Senate owes a debt of gratitude to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] for bringing this matter sharply before the Senate so that it may be decided intelligently. I also think the Senate is indebted to the Finance Committee for making the matter plain.

I think that a majority of the Senators have not claimed this exemption when they have made up their income-tax returns for the current year; that is, they have not claimed an exemption for the income tax they paid the year before. Previously to this it has not made very much difference whether they did or not, because the income tax was not very large; but I can not see any matter of morals or justice or principle in it. It is a pure matter of expediency. If you so arrange the income tax this year that you allow those who pay it to take back a third of it next year, you have simply got to put on a bigger tax, and that is the result of it. You have got to allow them to deduct expenses anyway. Taxes are considered in a class by themselves, and we allow certain taxes to be deducted. For myself, I do not believe taxes should be deducted.

For example, one man lives in his own house. Another man lives in a rented house. The man who pays rent pays taxes just as much as the man who owns the house, because he has got to pay his landlord enough more rent so that the landlord can pay the taxes out of the rent. But we permit the man who owns the house and pays the taxes directly to make the deduction. I do not see why the man who pays the taxes in his rent should not be allowed to make the deduction just the same.

Therefore I am on the extreme of this case. I would not allow any taxes to be deducted; but I certainly can not see any expediency in laying an income tax this year, collecting it next spring, and then permitting a third or a quarter of it to be taken back the following year. I am therefore opposed to the amendment tendered by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. The position of the Senator, then, is, of course, that we ought not to except any taxes—neither State taxes, municipal taxes, nor taxes paid to foreign governments—and none of those should go into our expense account.

Mr. HOLLIS. That would be my personal position. I do not understand that that is the position of the Senate. But there is a great difference, and it is a mere question of expediency, between allowing certain definite taxes to be taken out and allowing a part of what is paid in this year to be taken back next year. I can see a clear distinction.

Mr. McCUMBER. What would the Senator do in the case of a party who, having paid the taxes, finds that he has no net income? Would you still compel him to pay an income tax, which is presumed to be based upon a net income, when he has not got any net income?

Mr. HOLLIS. But that is his misfortune, if his income is so reduced the next year that he does not pay it. That has nothing to do with the justice of the tax.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, I know; but, Mr. President, it has to do with whether this is an income tax or whether it is not an income tax. If it is an income tax, it is presumed to be based upon a net income after paying expenses.

Mr. HOLLIS. For the current year. There are no expenses about it. The Senator has stated that a great many times. The taxpayer is not allowed to deduct any expenses of any kind. He is allowed merely to deduct certain specified things which include taxes. Now, taxes are not expenses. Taxes are payments.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then if a merchant has a stock of $100,000 of goods and the assessor of the State assesses him on $100,000 and he pays $5,000, as he would in some of our Western States with our high rate of taxation, the Senator would not count that $5,000 as part of the expenses of operating that business?

Mr. HOLLIS. Why, that is a matter of bookkeeping definition. He is not exempted on his taxes because they are an expense. He is exempted on his taxes because the Senate choose to exempt him on his taxes. Now, they might go further, but they never have.

Mr. McCUMBER. Why, the Senate have heretofore exempted him on his taxes because they recognized that all taxes paid were part of the necessary expenses of any business. Whether they are levied upon the business directly, as they are in many instances, or whether they are levied upon some other business, they are part of the expenses he has to meet every year.

Mr. HOLLIS. Not at all. The reason taxes have been exempted in cases of this kind is because the people who paid most of the taxes have been potent enough in legislation to get taxes exempted. That is the reason it was done. We followed a custom, a very poor custom, that had grown up. Now, these taxes were not allowed under the income-tax law to be exempted because they were expenses. If they had been, then you would have had to go further and allow the man for his rent, for his clerk hire, and so on, and all he would have been taxed on would be what he had left at the end of the year. But we tax him on what he spends for clerk hire, for rent, and for living expenses, and there is no reason to exempt them because they are an expense. That is not the reason.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator might find some basis for his argument in refusing to exempt his dwelling house, and so forth. That is something wholly disconnected from his business, because he might have a far more expensive dwelling house than was necessary; and there might be some basis for that argument. But, I am speaking now of this situation, I suppose it will be found that most of these taxes come from the business that produces the money to make the taxes. As I have said before, if a merchant were carrying a stock of $100,000, and he were assessed on $100,000, and the tax amounted, we will say, to $5,000, and after paying his clerks and his rent, his insurance, and this tax of $5,000 he found that he had not made anything, would you say that he had a net income from that business?

Mr. HOLLIS. No; but why should he be exempted on his taxes any more than on his clerk hire? Can the Senator give any logical reason for that?

Mr. McCUMBER. Why, he is exempted on his clerk hire. That is a part of his expenses.

Mr. HOLLIS. Not at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. Why, certainly it is—any expense that he pays out in his business is deducted from his gross income.

Mr. HOLLIS. In his business—that is true.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am speaking of his business.

Mr. HOLLIS. But it is not so for the rent he pays for his house, or for his household expenses.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I am speaking now of the business. I admit that we might possibly and properly exclude his taxes upon his home; but the most of these income taxes, I repeat, come from business, and the business itself pays very heavy taxes in the State, in the municipality, and in the Government; and if it is a tax on that business, why on earth should not the party operating that business be allowed to deduct that tax as a part of the expenses of operating it?

Mr. HOLLIS. He should, if you will increase your percentage of taxation on his income enough to offset it. You have either got to impose a higher income tax or else you have got to exclude that from the deduction.

Mr. McCUMBER. Now, sir, the Senator entirely agrees with me. That is what I stated but a short time ago. If it is simply that we desire to get more money on the income tax, let us increase the rates on the income, but do not let us levy the tax on a part of the expenses.

Mr. HOLLIS. I do not agree with the Senator on that, because when you get the rates up as high as they are in this bill you can not increase them any more. Therefore I would cut out the exemption.

Mr. McCUMBER. But let us not do an injustice or create an inequality in the method of levying the income taxes. We had better levy them right, and levy enough, so that those who really and honestly have an income will pay a tax on that income; and those who, after having deducted all of their taxes, find that they have not any income at all, will be relieved from paying an income tax; that is all.

Mr. HOLLIS. The difference between the Senator and myself is that he considers it a matter of justice and principle and morals, and I do not. I consider it a pure matter of expediency. I want to raise so much money, and this is the way I would do it. I do not agree with him. He has made his position very plain, but I think the Senate does not adopt his view of it.

Mr. McCUMBER. It may be, Mr. President; but I fail to see yet how the Senator can possibly disagree with me. I certainly would not disagree with him if he said that he did not make one penny in his business and therefore ought not to pay taxes. If I should say that he would have made some money if he had not paid taxes, and therefore I would tax him on the taxes, I think he would be right in considering that I did not propose to treat him justly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I think the confusion in which this matter has become involved arises from the fact that the law said the tax was payable in one year when the profit was earned in the preceding year. I take it that under the law as it is now there is no question but that income-tax payments would be excepted, as the Senator from North Dakota states; but if we are going to make exceptions I can not see why we could not make any exceptions we desired.

We are saying that the first $3,000 shall not be taxed now. That is in the act. That is arbitrary. It is not exact justice. Why make it three? Why not make it five? Why not make it one? There is an arbitrary amount fixed. In the same way, we could say that State taxes should not be allowed. We do say, by reason of a construction, that improvement taxes in cities are not to be allowed, and yet often they are not improvements at all. They are very heavy and burdensome at times, and yet they are not permitted to be offset against the amount of profits or income of the party.

This is a matter that is purely arbitrary. It can be fixed by Congress. While according to theory the word "income" might be used as strictly and literally the amount which a person receives over and above expenses, carrying out the theory of the Senator from North Dakota, yet in the effect of the bill that is practically immaterial, because if a certain amount of money is to be raised, inasmuch as Congress has the power to tax to the extent even of the value of all the property itself, it has a right to say what property shall be taxed, and how much it shall be taxed.

Under those circumstances it seems to me that to reconstruct this bill and set forth new and entirely different amounts and percentages of taxation would simply delay the matter enormously, and inasmuch as Congress has the power, and the power is exercised irrespective of individuals, without intent to harm any one person or any one corporation, it seems to me that we should let the amendment which the committee has proposed remain.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. By an arrangement my pair has been transferred to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], so that both the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] and myself may vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], which I transfer to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. That Senator not being present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SHAFROTH (when Mr. THOMAS's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness. I will state that he is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], which I transfer to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "nay."

Mr. KENDRICK. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], which I transfer to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. GORE. I am paired with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who is necessarily absent on account of illness. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], and under the arrangement which was announced yesterday by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] will stand paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. I vote "nay."

Mr. BECKHAM. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. VARDAMAN (after having voted in the negative). I ask if the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I have a pair with that Senator. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and let my vote stand.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and vote "nay."

Mr. KNOX. May I inquire if the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not.

Mr. KNOX. I withhold my vote, being paired with that Senator.

Mr. HUSTING. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and the senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] on official business.

Mr. JAMES. I inquire if the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not.

Mr. JAMES. I have a pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN];

The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]; and

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The result was announced—yeas 3, nays 57, as follows:

YEAS—3.

McCumber	Saulsbury	Sherman

NAYS—57.

Ashurst	Hitchcock	McKellar	Shafroth
Bankhead	Hollis	McNary	Sheppard
Beckham	Husting	Martin	Simmons
Borah	James	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Broussard	Johnson, Cal.	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Calder	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Smith, Mich.
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Newlands	Smoot
Curtis	Kellogg	Norris	Swanson
Fletcher	Kendrick	Overman	Townsend
France	Kenyon	Page	Trammell
Frelinghuysen	King	Pittman	Vardaman
Gerry	Kirby	Poindexter	Watson
Gronna	La Follette	Pomerene

NOT VOTING—36.

Brady	Goff	Phelan	Thompson
Brandegee	Gore	Reed	Tillman
Chamberlain	Harding	Shields	Underwood
Culberson	Hughes	Smith, Ariz.	Wadsworth
Cummins	Johnson, S. Dak.	Smith, S. C.	Walsh
Dillingham	Knox	Sterling	Warren
Fall	McLean	Stone	Weeks
Fernald	Owen	Sutherland	Williams
Gallinger	Penrose	Thomas	Wolcott

So Mr. MCCUMBER's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 101, after line 2, to insert:

SEC. 1201. (1) That paragraphs 2 and 3 of subdivision (a) of section 5 of such act of September 8, 1916, are hereby amended to read as follows:

"Second. All interest paid within the year on his indebtedness except on indebtedness incurred for the purchase of obligations or securities the interest upon which is exempt from taxation as income under this title;

"Third. Taxes paid within the year imposed by the authority of the United States (except income and excess profits taxes) or of its Territories, or possessions, or any foreign country, or by the authority of any State, county, school district, or municipality, or other taxing subdivision of any State, not including those assessed against local benefits;"

(2) Subdivision (c) of section 5 of such act of September 8, 1916, is hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 101, after line 18, to insert:

SEC. 1202. That (1) paragraphs 2 and 4 of subdivision (a) of section 6 of such act of September 8, 1916, are hereby amended to read as follows:

"Second. The proportion of all interest paid within the year by such person on his indebtedness (except on indebtedness incurred for the purchase of obligations or securities the interest upon which is exempt from taxation as income under this title) which the gross amount of his income for the year derived from sources within the United States bears to the gross amount of his income for the year derived from all sources within and without the United States, but this deduction shall be allowed only if such person includes in the return required by section 8 all the information necessary for its calculation;

"Third. Taxes paid within the year imposed by the authority of the United States (except income and excess profits taxes), or of its Territories, or possessions, or by the authority of any State, county, school district, or municipality, or other taxing subdivision of any State, paid within the United States, not including those assessed against local benefits;"

(2) Subdivision (b) of section 6 of such act of September 8, 1916, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(b) There shall also be allowed the same credit as specified in subdivision (b) of section 5, and likewise a credit for the amount of income, the normal tax on which has been paid or withheld for payment at the source of the income under the provisions of this title."

(3) Section 6 of such act of September 8, 1916, is also further amended by adding a new subdivision to read as follows:

"(c) A nonresident alien individual shall receive the benefit of the deductions and credits provided for in this section only by filing or causing to be filed with the collector of internal revenue a true and accurate return of his total income, received from all sources, corporate or otherwise, in the United States, in the manner prescribed by this title; and in case of his failure to file such return the collector shall collect the tax on such income, and all property belonging to such nonresident alien individual shall be liable to distraint for the tax."

The Secretary having read the amendment to line 16 on page 101,

Mr. MCCUMBER. I move to strike out all between lines 10 and 16, which is the third proposition. That would cover all taxes paid and would not authorize the deduction from incomes of any taxes. Of course, I do not know that anything that I could say would have any effect. I simply desire, even though I stand alone, to make the bill as logical as I can. If there is objection to striking out one kind of tax I can see no objection to striking out all kinds of taxes. The reasons are exactly the same. If there is reason for striking out one character of Federal taxes there is equal reason for striking out another character of Federal taxes. I do not know that I can ask any Senator to pay attention to it, but I wish to call attention to the fact that you are not allowed to except from your deduction all taxes paid to the Government, but only certain kinds. It reads:

Taxes paid within the year imposed by the authority of the United States (except income and war-profits taxes).

There are a number of other taxes that you pay to the United States besides income and war-profits taxes. I should like to ask some Senator to explain to me why those should not also be excepted.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. MCCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It seems to me, Mr. President, that the Senator from North Dakota does not really take into consideration the proper definition of net income and does not realize the real function of a tax upon net incomes. For the purpose of this bill we are now proposing to put a tax upon incomes for the year 1917 for the first time. We propose to ascertain the amount of net incomes accumulated during the year 1917. It is proposed to take a part of that net income by way of revenue to the Government.

If the Senator's theory is correct, then the net income accumulated during the year 1917 would pay no part of itself to the Government as revenue. It would entirely escape and exempt taxes paid to the State or to any municipality, because that is an expense of doing business in the year 1917. But at the end of the year when the net income is made up no income on excess-profits taxes has been paid to the Government. The income of that year represents the net earnings after deducting the local taxes, and it is of that net earnings that this bill proposes to take a part. The fact that it is payable next spring does not affect the transaction, but it is taking a part of the net income this year by reason of the fact that the income was earned in this year. The tax of the Federal Government is not a part of the expense of business in accumulating the income the same as other taxes, but it is a part of the income itself, and is not an item which can properly be charged to expense, because we are supposed to take a part of the thing which has accumulated at the end of the business year.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, as a post mortem argument the Senator's statements are very interesting, but inasmuch as the proposition to make the law just and logical has already been defeated, it has little application at the present time and no application whatever to the point that I was making. The point that I was making, and I hope the Senator will be able to comprehend it, was that you excepted a certain character of Federal tax which you were not allowed to deduct, but you are allowed to deduct any other Federal taxes. For instance, you pay a tax on your automobile for 1917, and when you make out the returns in 1918 you are allowed to deduct that tax. That tax has not the slightest thing to do with your business. It is a tax on your pleasure only. You do not need to enjoy that particular character of pleasure if you do not wish to do it, and if you do wish it, it is very appropriate of course that you should pay a tax on it.

But according to the very weighty arguments that were given a short time ago against the other proposition, it really seems ridiculous to allow you to deduct that tax which you pay for automobiles in order to determine what your income for the next year will be. That is exactly what you do here, and that is why I call the attention of the Senate to it, so that it could strike it out and at least be consistent.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the reference to the particular item of the tax on automobiles would seem somewhat to bear out the contention of the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. Only seem?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. But that tax is quite apart from the ordinary Federal taxes such as the general tax for doing business and so forth. I think even the first reason given by the Senator does not militate against a general proposition that an income tax is a part of the income. It may be that the particular tax on automobiles—a mere pleasure—should not properly be exempted; but that is different from the ordinary Federal taxes, and it is such a small item that it seems to me no distinction should be made between that small item of taxes which in a way is an expense in doing business. The automobile to-day is not wholly a pleasure machine. I imagine the Senator may use a machine in doing his business. I do not know whether he does or not, but some Senators, at least in performing their duties here, use a machine for the purpose of carrying on their ordinary avocations, and in a sense at least it is chargeable as a part of the expense of doing business within the year. But that is wholly different from an income tax which proposes to take a part of the identical income which came in during the year.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, Mr. President, every Senator spends a great deal of money in stationery, stamps, and other matters that are connected with his official business, but he never for a moment thinks of charging those expenses up as a matter of deduction in his taxes. Now, let me present it to the Senator in another way. We levy a tax of 8 cents on every pack of cards. Since the days of auction bridge there has been considerable increase in the playing-card business. Every manufacturer of cards will immediately tack 8 cents more to the price of a pack of cards, probably 10 cents to pay the interest on his money invested in taxes. Yet the tax that the manufacturers pay upon that is a Federal tax.

Now, according to the strict letter of that law they can deduct that tax—first collect it from the public and then deduct it, because the only taxes of the Government which they are not allowed to deduct are income and excess-profits taxes. All other Federal taxes they can deduct.

Of course I can see logically an inconsistency, and if we insist that it shall be unjust and inconsistent in some particulars it would be consistent that it should be unjust and inconsistent in other particulars.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator, however, will agree that the payment of taxes under those circumstances is a part of the expense of carrying on the business and takes away a part of the earnings and thus reduces the net income.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is attempting to draw a very delicate distinction which not even his own acute mind, I think, can fully grasp.

I simply move to strike out the paragraph that they may be all put upon exactly the same basis. I think if we exempt one kind of Federal taxes we should exempt all taxes paid to the Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to offer another amendment. After the word "the," in line 11, I move to strike out the balance of that line and line 12 down to the word "Territories," so that it will read:

Third. Taxes paid within the year imposed by the authority of the Territories or possessions, or by the authority of any State, county, school district, or municipality, or other taxing subdivision of any State, paid within the United States—

And so forth.

That would clear up the matter and would prevent the deduction of any Federal tax.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment presented by the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. I did not hear the Secretary read subdivision 2 and following on page 102.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary was stopped at that point for the purpose of permitting the Senator to offer his amendment. The amendment of the committee has been agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, if I understand the Chair, the agreement will reach down to line 14 on page 103.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was the effect of the vote, as the Chair understands it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I see there are matters in that part of the section that will need some consideration, but I shall not urge it at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 103, after line 13, to insert:

SEC. 1203. (1) That section seven of such act of September 8, 1916, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 7. That for the purpose of the normal tax only, there shall be allowed as an exemption in the nature of a deduction from the amount of the net income of each citizen or resident of the United States, ascertained as provided herein, the sum of $3,000, plus $1,000 additional if the person making the return be a head of a family or a married man with a wife living with him, or plus the sum of $1,000 additional if the person making the return be a married woman with a husband living with her; but in no event shall this additional exemption of $1,000 be deducted by both a husband and a wife: Provided, That only one deduction of $4,000 shall be made from the aggregate income of both husband and wife when living together: Provided further, That if the person making the return is the head of a family there shall be an additional exemption of $200 for each child dependent upon such person, if under 18 years of age, or if incapable of self-support because mentally or physically defective, but this provision shall operate only in the case of one parent in the same family: Provided further, That guardians or trustees shall be allowed to make this personal exemption as to income derived from the property of which such guardian or trustee has charge in favor of each ward or cestui que trust: Provided further, That in no event shall a ward or cestui que trust be allowed a greater personal exemption than $3,000, or, if married, $4,000, as provided in this section, from the amount of net income received from all sources. There shall also be allowed an exemption from the amount of the net income of estates of deceased citizens or residents of the United States during the period of administration or settlement, and of trust or other estates of citizens or residents of the United States the income of which is not distributed annually or regularly under the provisions of subdivision (b) of section 2, the sum of $3,000, including such deductions as are allowed under section 5."

(2) Subdivision (b) of section 7 of such act of September 8, 1916, is hereby repealed.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to call especially the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] to the fact that there probably are some provisions of the bill which appear upon their face to have been drawn for the special advantage of citizens of greater wealth. I call attention to the provision at the top of page 104.

Provided, That only one deduction of $4,000 shall be made from the aggregate income of both husband and wife when living together.

In other words, if they are not living together each of them may have a deduction of $4,000. According to this they can each have a deduction if they are not living together. That is the clear reading of the law.

Of course, among the average American people a man and his wife generally live together, but of late years, through the liberality of the divorce laws, among the higher and wealthier class there are a great many husbands and wives who are not living together. They would be allowed, according to the clear letter of this law, an exemption greater than would be allowed poorer mortals who, though they may have some little temperamental disagreements, are nevertheless required by the law of necessity to live together and get along as best they can. It seems to me that those who are criticizing this bill on the ground that it is drawn for the benefit of the wealthy, and especially the wealthy divorcees, might find some ground of argument on that proposition.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to make an inquiry of the chairman of the committee as to what construction he places upon the provision of the section of the bill which has just been read in connection with the provisions of section 3 as to the exemption of $1,000 for unmarried persons and of $2,000 for married persons as against the additional tax which is proposed by section 1 of the measure? In other words, Mr. President, I desire to know if section 3, in view of the provision that an exemption shall be allowed only upon the normal tax, would interfere with or bar a person from having the exemption provided in section 2 of the bill up to the extent of $1,000 in the case of unmarried persons and of $2,000 in the case of married persons?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will suggest to the Senator from Florida that this amendment has absolutely no connection with the section of the bill to which he refers. This is merely an amendment to the existing income-tax law; it is not an amendment to the part of the bill which relates to the additional taxes.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is very true, Mr. President, but section 3 of the bill refers to the particular section of the present law which we are now amending and provides a method by which to determine the manner in which the exemption shall be made; it refers to the method prescribed therein for determining the exemption. Therefore in construing this law section 3 will be construed with the amendment to section 7 of the present law.

Mr. SIMMONS. I thought the Senator was referring to the amount. Of course, the method of making the exemptions and deductions will be the same as under the old law, because we provide that the method shall be the same as provided in that law. I thought the Senator was referring to the amounts allowed by way of exemption in the old law.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The matter I desired to be sure of, Mr. President, was that the wording of the amended section 7, where it is stated that the exemption shall be made from the normal tax only, would not exclude the exemptions as provided in section 3 of the bill which we are now considering, which provides an exemption of $1,000 for unmarried persons and of $2,000 for married persons.

Mr. SIMMONS. There is no change from the existing law; that is the present law. The only change on that page is in line 1, page 2, where we add the words "individual, a citizen or resident of the United States." In other respects that part of the section is the same as the present law. We added the words "citizen or resident of the United States" to meet the case of our eliminating the exemptions allowed to nonresident aliens.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, the point I had in mind was that the present law makes the exemption by a certain amount for married and unmarried persons.

Mr. SIMMONS. It does.

Mr. TRAMMELL. It makes that exemption from the normal tax only and not from the additional tax, which is provided in the additional law. Now, we are dealing with a new character of taxation, and the taxation with which we are now dealing would not come under the category of the normal tax but would be an extra tax. This provision is that the exemption shall be made from the normal tax. I have been rather impressed, however, from the wording of section 3 that it must have been the purpose and intention of the committee that the exemption should be authorized and prevail not merely as to the normal tax, which is not the tax that we are imposing in this bill, but as to the tax imposed by the original income-tax measure; that that should be exempt up to the amount specified in this bill and that it should not be restricted merely to the normal income tax. I desire to know the purpose and object of the committee on that point.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Florida is somewhat confused about that matter, though he may not be. There is a normal tax in the present law; there is an additional normal tax in the pending bill. The exemptions both in the pending bill and in the existing law are only exemptions from the normal tax. Neither of them are exemptions from the surtax, but only from the normal tax.

Mr. TRAMMELL. It is not the object and purpose, then, to allow the exemptions to apply to the additional tax which is being imposed by this particular bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. Except the additional normal tax.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Well, Mr. President, I do not quite understand where we have an additional normal tax.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is a new normal tax. The present law, if the Senator will pardon me, imposes a normal tax upon individuals of 2 per cent; this bill places an additional normal tax upon individuals of 2 per cent, which will make the rate, if this bill becomes a law, 4 per cent normal tax instead of 2 per cent normal tax as under the present law.

Mr. CURTIS. Then, Mr. President, the exemption in section 3, as I understand the Senator, applies to the extra 2 per cent normal tax?

Mr. SIMMONS. This is an amendment to the present law.

Mr. CURTIS. I understand that; but section 7 of the present law allows exemption on the normal tax of $4,000 to a married person.

Mr. SIMMONS. On the 2 per cent tax under the present law.

Mr. CURTIS. On the 2 per cent tax under the present law.

Mr. SIMMONS. And in this bill there are allowed exemptions on $1,000 and $2,000.

Mr. CURTIS. On the extra tax?

Mr. SIMMONS. On the extra normal tax of 2 per cent.

Mr. CURTIS. That is as I understood it.

Mr. TRAMMELL. It is my understanding, then, from the Senator's explanation——

Mr. SIMMONS. We have two systems running together. Under each one there will be a normal tax of 2 per cent. The normal tax under the present law will be subject to deductions of $3,000 and $4,000, and the normal tax under the new law will be subject to deductions of only $1,000 and $2,000.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is the information I desired to procure—as to whether or not that applied to the original normal tax provided for in the law of 1916, and also as provided for in the pending measure. It applies to both, as I understand the chairman of the committee?

Mr. SIMMONS. It applies to both, but the exemptions are different.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is the information I desired.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I want to ask the chairman of the committee if the reasons were sufficiently overwhelming to the committee to prevent a consolidation of those two sections with respect to the exemptions? The chairman has very well said that we are running two systems parallel, one imposing a tax of 2 per cent and the other a tax of 2 per cent, but that the exemptions differ. It seems to me it would have obviated a great deal of complication and complexity in the internal-revenue office in assessing the taxes if there could have been a union of the methods of the two laws for the purpose of determining the income tax to be imposed upon individuals.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator from Utah that this bill is in all of its provisions and in all of its titles distinctively a war tax. It is expected that as soon as the war conditions have passed away this part of our internal system of taxation will disappear from our statute books, allowing the laws that we have enacted taxing incomes and excess profits to remain as they were under the old law—that is, not as to excess profits, because we repeal that altogether; the excess profits tax that is now on the statute books, as the Senator understands, being put on as a war tax, so that it was easy to consolidate that, and we did it; but the income tax which we now have is not a war tax; it is a permanent peace-time tax, and we tried to keep them separate, so that when the conditions calling for this extraordinary amount of revenue shall have passed away we can dispose of these taxes without interfering with the present law and without making it necessary to enact a new system.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, my colleague [Mr. KING] was not in the Senate Chamber the other day when this question arose, and I want simply to add one word to what the chairman of the committee [Mr. SIMMONS] has already said. This bill has been written with a view that it may be repealed at any time and not interfere with the present law, with the single exception of the excess war-profits tax, which we may not want to have as a part of our present system. If it had not been for that we could have written this bill in a very much more compact form than it is; but the committee thought when they first began to prepare the bill that the only way to do so was to so frame it that, if desired, it could be repealed on any day or in any year and not interfere with the present taxing system.

Mr. KING. If my colleague will permit me, I anticipated that that was the reason which prompted the committee to try to keep parallel the two systems of taxation; yet it seems to me that the reasons assigned by the chairman of the committee and by my colleague are not sufficient justification for the maintenance of this system, because as soon as this war is over it is obvious that the old law, even if the act we are passing now expires by limitation, will not be adequate to meet changed conditions, but a new revenue law will have to be passed that will make drastic changes in the existing law.

Mr. SMOOT. I think, Mr. President, that it will only be in the rates and not in the items or articles to which the tax shall be applied or the agencies which will be required to pay it.

Mr. KING. I hope my colleague is right; but I feel persuaded that after this war is over, with the tremendous burden that will rest upon the country even in peace times, new fields of taxation will have to be entered upon and largely increased taxes will be required from the funds of the people. So it would seem to me that if we had one consolidated uniform system of raising the revenues now under one bill it would avoid much complication and uncertainty. The fact that there will be required a new system of taxation, entering upon different and new fields after the war is over, will necessitate, of course, a change of the existing law, and therefore the system now proposed is hardly warranted.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with my colleague that the expenses of the Government after the close of the war for many years will be very great indeed; but I believe, Mr. President, that the taxes that will be collected at the close of the war will be collected from a very few sources. It would not surprise me at all to see all of them collected from incomes, from excess profits, from tobacco, and, if we do not have nation-wide prohibition, from liquors and beer, and that class of manufactured products.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the next amendment reported by the committee.

The SECRETARY. On page 105, after line 5, the committee proposes to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 1204. (1) That subdivisions (c) and (e) of section 8 of such act of September 8, 1916, are hereby amended to read as follows:

"(c) Guardians, trustees, executors, administrators, receivers, conservators, and all persons, corporations, or associations acting in any fiduciary capacity shall make and render a return of the income of the person, trust, or estate for whom or which they act, and be subject to all the provisions of this title which apply to individuals. Such fiduciary shall make oath that he has sufficient knowledge of the affairs of such person, trust, or estate to enable him to make such return and that the same is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, true and correct, and be subject to all the provisions of this title which apply to individuals: Provided, That a return made by one of two or more joint fiduciaries filed in the district where such fiduciary resides, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, shall be a sufficient compliance with the requirements of this paragraph: Provided further, That no return of income not exceeding $3,000 shall be required except as in this title otherwise provided.

"(e) Persons carrying on business in partnership shall be liable for income tax only in their individual capacity, and the share of the profits of the partnership to which any taxable partner would be entitled if the same were divided, whether divided or otherwise, shall be returned for taxation and the tax paid under the provisions of this title: Provided, That from the net distributive interests on which the individual members shall be liable for tax, normal and additional, there shall be excluded their proportionate shares received from interest on the obligations of a State or any political or taxing subdivision thereof, and upon the obligations of the United States and its possessions, and that for the purpose of computing the normal tax there shall be allowed a credit, as provided by section 5, subdivision (b), for their proportionate share of the profits derived from dividends. Such partnership, when requested by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue or any district collector, shall render a correct return of the earnings, profits, and income of the partnership, except income exempt under section 4 of this act, setting forth the item of the gross income and the deductions and credits allowed by this title, and the names and addresses of the individuals who would be entitled to the net earnings, profits, and income, if distributed. A partnership shall have the same privilege of fixing and making returns upon the basis of its own fiscal year as is accorded to corporations under this title. The share of the profits of a partnership to which any taxable partner would be entitled for a fiscal year ending in 1916, or subsequent tax years for which the rates of tax have been or shall be changed by law, shall be returned for taxation and the tax paid under the respective rates applicable to each calendar year in the proportion that the period of each calendar year bears to the full fiscal year."

(2) Subdivision (d) of section 8 of such act of September 8, 1916, is hereby repealed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate as well as the attention of the chairman of the committee to a difference in the treatment between persons carrying on business as corporations and persons carrying on business in the form of partnerships or unincorporated associations. It will be observed, as was stated by the Senator from Minnesota this morning—and I should like the attention of the Senate to this proposition—that under subdivision (e):

Persons carrying on business in partnership shall be liable for income tax only in their individual capacity, and the share of the profits of the partnership to which any taxable partner would be entitled if the same were divided, whether divided or otherwise, shall be returned for taxation and the tax paid under the provisions of this title.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] will recall that this matter was up before the committee, and I think at that time he agreed with me that so far as corporation business was concerned it should be treated exactly the same as a like business carried on by a partnership and that there should not be accorded to one class exemptions not accorded to the other.

There are but few Senators in this Chamber, Mr. President, and inasmuch as this vote will be a vote of the confidence generally in the committee rather than a vote upon the merits of the question I would prefer to have the attention of Senators who are in the Chamber at this time as to this proposition, and may I ask the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], who always gives to these subjects the benefit of careful thought and a sense of justice, to give attention to the distinction that is made by the committee between partnerships and corporations?

Here is a partnership carrying on a business and earning $100,000 a year; it has invested, we will say, $500,000 of capital. Here is another institution operated by a corporation; it also invests $500,000 in capital and divides it among the several stockholders by the issue of stock. They both do exactly the same kind of business; they may be trading side by side; one of them earns a hundred thousand dollars and the other one earns a hundred thousand dollars. Every dollar of that $100,000 earned by the partnership is taxed to the last penny in an ascending scale. If there are two partners, they pay on $50,000 each; if there are 20, on one-tenth of that amount, or $5,000 each; and this is paid though not a dollar is distributed. Now, how about the corporation? This is what governs the corporation:

The tax imposed by this subdivision shall not apply to that portion of such undistributed net income which is actually invested and employed in the business or is retained for employment in the reasonable requirements of the business: Provided, That if the Secretary of the Treasury ascertains and finds that any portion of such amount so retained at any time for employment in the business is not so employed or is not reasonably required in the business a tax of 15 per cent shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid thereon—

The business of each is exactly the same; it becomes necessary on the part of the partnership, because of the character of its business, because of the demands of the Government for the ensuing year, that it shall put to surplus and reinvest in betterments, to answer the demands of the trade for the ensuing year, every dollar of its income for that year; and yet it is taxed to the full limit, to the last penny. If the corporation finds that it must do exactly the same thing, the corporation does not pay one penny of tax on its undistributed profits. The partnership pays on every dollar. There is, of course, a 6 per cent tax generally applied to corporations and not applied to partnerships; but upon the undistributed portion the corporations are allowed to go practically scot free, while the partnership is taxed to the last cent. I want to ask any Senator if he regards that as just and fair?

There is no possible excuse for it; there is no reason for it, if the business is exactly the same. The reason is altogether the other way. Every partner is responsible to the last penny he has on earth for every dollar of indebtedness of the partnership, while the corporation stockholder is not responsible for one penny of debt, and yet it is proposed to give him that preference, and to lay this heavy tax upon the members of a partnership.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. KING. That would have a tendency, would it not, under the Senator's construction, to force partnerships to become corporations, if there is a greater burden imposed upon partnerships than there is upon corporations?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; but they can not escape the injustice this year. The partnership has not been changed into a corporation at the present time. There may be reasons why it can not conveniently change. Naturally, of course, if a partnership could escape the burden by incorporating, it would do so; but it can not escape the tax that is placed upon it in the year 1917 by taking out articles of incorporation in 1918.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon another inquiry?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. KING. If the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico were adopted, that would tend to cure the evil of which the Senator is now complaining, would it not?

Mr. McCUMBER. Which amendment?

Mr. KING. I refer to the amendment suggested by the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator mean the amendment in regard to the corporation tax?

Mr. KING. No. As I understood the Senator from New Mexico——

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator refers probably to the tax on undistributed corporate income.

Mr. KING. Yes; would not that tend to cure the evil of which the Senator complains?

Mr. McCUMBER. It would tend possibly in some instances to compel a distribution, but that was not the basis on which the Senator from New Mexico urged that tax. I think his claim was a very fair one, namely, that he was not seeking to force a distribution, because he recognized that in many cases the money ought to be reinvested; but he took the position—and it was a logical position—that it was nevertheless an earning; it was a profit, and as the bill seeks to impose a tax on profits the corporation should pay that tax whether its income is distributed or not. I think he agrees with me that the same principle ought to apply to partnerships. There were some reasons why I did not agree entirely with the Senator from New Mexico. I believe to-day that the very best interests of the Government demand that everything possible should be allowed to go into capital this year and become income-bearing for the next year, to help out this country in the great necessities that are bound to confront it, when we will have to levy much heavier taxes. For that reason, my inclination was to be light on the first year's levy, to get all that I could into capital of this year's earnings that I might have more to levy my tax upon for the ensuing years, when there would be a heavy demand for greater taxation. In principle, there is no difference between the Senator from New Mexico and myself in regard to the logic upon which he claimed to tax these undivided incomes.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to ask the Senator if he knows of any reason why a surtax should be waived in favor of a corporation, so as to enable it to keep in its business more money, any more than any other tax?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes, Mr. President; I see this difference: If I am a member of a corporation or even a member of a partnership which earns for me, we will say, $20.000 this year, and I draw out that $20,000 and spend it in excessive living, the Government has gotten no good out of it. If I put that $20,000 into an extension of my plant whereby I can produce more for the Government next year, and will produce more, and will thereby pay a greater tax next year, I can see how it would be beneficial to the Government that this money should be reinvested, and the Government might well excuse me from a tax on it on condition that I do not use the money for my own personal use, but use it in such a way that the Government will get something out of it next year.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota further yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator realizes, of course, that this bill does not provide for any surtax upon undistributed corporate net income, regardless of the kind of corporation which may have the net income; does he not?

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand the proposition.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Can the Senator explain to me what good it will do to the Government to permit a corporation engaged in the brokerage business to retain its net income without the payment of a surtax?

Mr. McCUMBER. And therefore the Senator very wisely, in his proffered amendment, made a distinction, and provided for a deduction to those corporations which produced something for the benefit of the Government.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. But the Senator must recall that that was eliminated from this bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. And the bill as it now stands exempts all corporations, regardless of the purpose for which they are organized, from the payment of any surtax on the retained and undistributed net income; does it not?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes. I think it would be better if it applied only to those corporations which actually produced something from which the Government could derive a benefit for the ensuing year.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then the Senator is contending that the Government ought to remit a part of the income tax in favor of corporations which are willing to keep the money and use it in their business? He is willing that that shall be done, and he goes further and insists that partnerships should be permitted the same privilege.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the one is permitted the privilege, certainly the other should be. That is my position.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then I will ask the Senator further what he would suggest as to individuals who are engaged in business?

Mr. McCUMBER. Exactly the same thing.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The individual engaged in business, whether he takes his money out of the business or not, must pay a surtax upon his income; and I will ask the Senator if he would likewise want to exempt the individual?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator will recall that in committee I took the position that the matter was one which should be applied to the business, and that all businesses of the same character should be treated the same, whether they were operated by an individual, by a partnership, or by a corporation; and I still take the same position. But I can not get all that I want in this bill. I tried to get a little matter of justice in it a short time ago; and while the Senators were at luncheon, and heard nothing of the argument, they immediately came back to the voting, and, not wishing to disturb themselves about ascertaining what had been said, voted, as we often do, to sustain whatever the committee had recommended. I possibly could get little more hearing upon this proposition, but I feel that I will not have done my duty until I present that injustice and attempt to correct it in some way.

I have had quite a number of Senators tell me upon the other amendment that I was absolutely right in explaining it, and that they would vote with me upon it; but when it came to the vote it seemed to be going the other way, and the numbers on my side seemed to be so few that they lost their courage to stand by their convictions. There is magic in majorities, and that magic seemed to weigh very much in the scale in the vote upon that proposition. But here is a proposition which every Senator will acknowledge to be an injustice. Now, will you attempt to correct it? Will any Senator have the audacity to stand upon his feet to-day and say that if a corporation is doing a certain kind of business it can retain every dollar that it earns and put it into an extension of its business without the payment of a penny of tax, while if the same business is operated by a partnership the individual partners must pay a tax upon every dollar of their earnings, even though every dollar goes back into the concern?

I know a number of partnerships which this year will make good, fair money, and I know that practically everything they make will go right into betterments; but each partner must pay the full tax due upon the net earnings whether they go into the business for the benefit of the Government in the ensuing year or not.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know whether the Senator has yet referred to the fact that the committee undertook to equalize the taxes between the partnership and the corporation by imposing an additional normal tax upon corporations that is not imposed upon partnerships or individuals.

Mr. McCUMBER. I mentioned the fact, and the Senator heard me, that they imposed a tax of 6 per cent upon corporations. That is 4 per cent in addition to the present corporation tax.

Mr. SMOOT. That is right.

Mr. McCUMBER. But that does not equalize it.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it would equalize it, because only 2 per cent increase of the normal tax upon the corporations of the country would raise $180,000,000.

Mr. McCUMBER. All right. Now, let us suppose that that is true—that that 2 per cent increase raises an additional $180,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. And I will say to the Senator now that I do not believe there are undistributed profits in all the partnerships of the United States amounting to that much—$180,000,000 a year.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, suppose that is true: If 98 per cent of the business was carried on by corporations and only 2 per cent was carried on by partnerships, would the Senator expect to secure as great a tax from the 2 per cent as he would from the 98 per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator must have misunderstood me. I said that the amount of the 2 per cent tax on corporations was greater than all of the profits that had been undistributed by all the partnerships of this country—not that the tax upon partnerships amounted to $180,000,000, but that the undistributed profits would not amount to $180,000,000, whereas the 2 per cent tax upon the corporations of the country does amount to $180,000,000.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, suppose that were true. That is true simply because the vast proportion of the business of the country is carried on by corporations. But suppose 90 per cent of the business is carried on by corporations and 10 per cent is carried on by individuals and by partnerships, would you make a different rule concerning the business carried on by that 10 per cent than you would for the 90 per cent? Would you make the 10 per cent pay a tax on every dollar that they earned, although it went right back into the business, while you would excuse the 90 per cent entirely from the payment of that tax?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; and I do not think that is what we do. For instance, take 10 per cent of the $180,000,000; that is, $18,000,000 that the corporation would pay by the 2 per cent normal tax. Now, the 2 per cent normal tax increase, if it amount to $18,000,000, would be more, I believe, in dollars and cents than the whole of the undistributed profits of partnerships. So I think we have equalized the difference between the partnerships in this country and the corporations by the tax that we have imposed upon the corporations that is not imposed upon partnerships.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, now, let us see for just a moment whether it is equalized or not. We will suppose that here is a corporation with a capital of $1,000,000 that will make 50 per cent, or $500,000. Now, it puts that $500,000 right back into its business. What does it pay? It pays 6 per cent upon that $500,000, or $30,000.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment; let me finish this statement. Suppose, now, that, on the other hand, a partnership is operating the same business with the same capital, and there are two partners, and they make $500,000, or $250,000 each. Each partner, then, is paying a tax on $250,000. Now, in the case of an income of $250,000, what is the present rate of tax? It is about 30 per cent, is it not?

Mr. SMOOT. The proposed rate of taxation?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; the proposed tax would be somewhere about 30 per cent. Then you have the corporation paying 6 per cent and you have the partnership paying about 30 per cent. That is the difference.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that we can suppose a case such as the Senator has, that never in the history of the country will happen, and prove that any tax that may be imposed is an injustice to some other supposed case. I can take the cases cited by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] in his speech upon the war-profits tax. I can turn them around and suppose cases to fit his amendment, and they will be even more ridiculous than the cases appeared to be that he cited.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I first yield to the Senator from New Mexico, and then I will take up the Senator's supposed case.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I wanted to suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that each of the individual partners would have to pay 4 per cent normal tax, equivalent to 4 of the 6 per cent of the tax which is imposed upon corporations, and that the only additional tax imposed upon corporations is 2 per cent, and that must be compared with all the surtaxes that the partners would pay.

Mr. McCUMBER. To be sure. It simply makes it so much worse; that is all. The partners in the case I have cited have to pay on $500,000, and it is a pretty big tax. If it is a partnership of two, they have to pay on $250,000 each. Now, the Senator from Utah says that this is just a supposed case. It is no more a supposed case than any other possible case that you can give. There is a certain percentage of the business of this country that is conducted by partnerships and individuals. I do not know the exact per cent, but I would say from 10 to 20 per cent.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have recently seen the statement that only 80 per cent of the manufacturing business of this country is carried on by corporations, leaving 20 per cent of the manufacturing business of the country to be carried on by individuals and partnerships.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is the reason I stated it would run from 10 to 20 per cent. I do not know the exact per cent. But if the business is the same, it is utterly ridiculous as well as unjust to say that you will tax one business for every dollar that is earned, whether it goes back into the business or not, and you will free all the rest of like business, if it goes back into the business.

Mr. President, it is even worse than that when you come to apply it to the actual conditions. The great corporations, the corporations which make the millions, are the corporations that can take every dollar that they earn and put it right back into the business and pay no tax at all upon it. The little fellow, the individual, the small partnership, those who produce the other 20 per cent, whose incomes are infinitesimal compared with these mighty incomes, will have to pay the full tax on every dollar earned. In that way you give a preference to those who do not need the preference, and you deny justice to those who most need to have justice meted out to them.

I know there is little use of making any argument upon that proposition; but, Mr. President, I am going to have a chance to vote on it, if I vote alone. So I am going to ask, after the Secretary has finished reading, that after line 8, on page 107, which deals with partnerships, we insert exactly what we have inserted with reference to corporations, namely:

> The tax imposed by this subdivision shall not apply to that portion of such undistributed net income which is actually invested and employed in the business or is retained for employment in the reasonable requirements of the business: Provided, That if the Secretary of the Treasury ascertains and finds that any portion of such amount so retained at any time for employment in the business is not so employed or is not reasonably required in the business, a tax of 15 per cent shall be levied—

And so forth.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hardwick	McNary	Sheppard
Beckham	Hitchcock	Martin	Sherman
Brandegee	Husting	Myers	Simmons
Chamberlain	James	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Culberson	Johnson, Cal.	New	Smoot
Curtis	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Sterling
Dillingham	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Sutherland
France	Kellogg	Page	Swanson
Frelinghuysen	King	Penrose	Townsend
Gerry	Kirby	Pomerene	Trammell
Gore	Knox	Reed	Vardaman
Gronna	Lewis	Robinson	Watson
Hale	McCumber	Saulsbury	Weeks
Harding	McKellar	Shafroth	Williams.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I suggested the absence of a quorum because of the importance of an amendment just offered in the Senate by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. I have just listened to an argument which to my mind is extremely forcible in support of that amendment. It is an amendment which will affect a large number of business interests in this country. It is an amendment which has for its purpose the doing of justice, common justice, between the business interests of this country.

The Senator from North Dakota had just pointed out in the most forcible manner how under this bill it is proposed to discriminate in the most flagrant manner against the people of this country who are doing business as partnerships. The Senator from North Dakota has pointed to the provision in the bill which, while it says that the partnership shall pay no income tax, yet says that all of the net income of the partnership, whether distributed or not, whether kept in the business or not, shall be accounted for by the individual partners, and the individual partners shall pay upon that not only the normal tax but a surtax.

In the illustration just given to the Senate of the partnership which earns a half million dollars in profits and invests it in the business, yet the two partners must each return for income-tax purposes $250,000, and of that under this proposed bill the Government will get over 26 per cent of the entire amount. The surtax ranges from 1 per cent up to a much higher rate than 26 per cent, but on the average it would take from each partner 26.6 per cent of the entire amount. But if the corporation earning a half million dollars desires to keep that half million dollars in its business, it will pay only 6 per cent upon the half million dollars retained in its business. It has been pointed out that 20 per cent of the manufacturing interests of this country are done by other than corporations. As to mercantile and various other lines of business, we have no statistics; but it is reasonable to say that 20 or 25 per cent of the business of the country is done by corporations. In all these instances, whether individuals or partnerships, if they earn a net income and want to increase their production, want to add to the resources of the country, they must pay a surtax, but your corporation goes scot free.

I appeal to Senators if that is justice, and in this time when every dollar should bear its share of this burden I ask if you are going to exempt from this surtax upon incomes all the undistributed net incomes of the corporations of the country?

Mr. President, I have heard something about slackers among men. We do not want any slacker dollars in this country any more than we want slackers among men, and if these corporations had the soul of a human being they would cast aside these dollars of income which escape the surtax paid by individuals and partners as an unclean thing. But that is what this bill proposes to do.

As I showed to the Senate the other day, there are four billion and a half dollars collected annually by these corporations as net incomes which are retained in the business, and these four and a half billion dollars escape the surtax. I ask, Is it right? Can the Senate justify itself by declaring here that the net income of partnerships shall be accounted for by the individual partners and the partners compelled to pay a surtax, although the income is retained in the business, and allow the net income of these corporations to go practically scot free?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator intend to press the amendment which he offered early in the consideration of the bill? I ask that question because it seems to me that the Senate ought to have an opportunity to vote on that question first. I agree with the Senator that there is a great difference now shown in the bill between the profits of corporations and individuals and partners. As for myself, I believe that beyond a reasonable exemption they should all be reached. It seems to me that it would be unjust to leave both as we have provided in the bill now. The Senator's amendment, which I understood he proposed earlier, would make it easier for Senators to determine how they would vote on this proposition if that question was settled first.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I purpose to present the amendment to the Senate; and I am inclined to think myself that it would be wise to defer the consideration of this subject until we reach that stage of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I might add also that while we have passed over one provision of the bill, I think it is very well if at that time we should consider the advisability of reconsidering what I understand has been the action of the Senate upon another paragraph of the bill, because the matters are very closely related.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] and also to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] as far as I am personally concerned I believe that I echo the sentiments of a majority of the committee when I say that they are perfectly willing to adopt any system that will equalize the taxation between corporations and partnerships. We thought that the 2 per cent additional normal tax imposed upon corporations would do that, and based upon past history of the amount that has been retained of the profits, I am quite sure it would do it and more than do it, but if the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota is adopted, in all justice to corporations we then ought to return to title 1 of the bill and allow the 4 per cent increased normal tax to apply to partnerships doing business. The Senator will agree if that were adopted they would then be on an equal basis.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Provided, Mr. President——

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Utah is absolutely logical. I would like to ask the Senator from North Dakota whether he would not accept that as an addition to his amendment?

Mr. MCCUMBER. I will say again that while I think that a corporation has an advantage over a partnership under all circumstances, in that stockholders are in no sense liable for the debts of the corporation while every partner is not only liable for his own debts but that of the entire business, and therefore labors under some disadvantage from that fact alone; nevertheless, if you will say that the business shall have the same exemption in reference to that portion which is earned and put into the business again, whether carried on by corporations or by partnerships, I shall have no objection to taking out that extra 2 per cent which is charged to the corporation and putting them both upon the same basis.

Mr. SMOOT. I would not ask that the additional normal tax on corporations be reduced. All I ask is that 2 per cent be added to copartnerships, thus equalizing the two.

Mr. MCCUMBER. It is virtually the same thing.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from New Mexico will allow me, I wish to say that it is a question in my mind whether there are advantages in business transacted through a corporation. I know there are disadvantages, and whether the advantages accruing to partnerships more than offset the disadvantages to corporate companies it is doubtful. I think there is no member of the committee who does not want to treat the individuals, partnerships, and corporations, as far as the imposition of taxes is concerned, as nearly alike as possible. I believe, if we adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota, with the understanding that we shall also provide that the normal tax upon the individuals and the partnerships and the corporations shall be the same, that would settle the question as far as the Senator from North Dakota is concerned.

There is another question involved in the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico that we can discuss later when we reach that point.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. SIMMONS. Do I understand the Senator from Utah to suggest that the individual shall be permitted to retain in the business as much of his annual earnings as he thinks are reasonably required in the business without paying any tax at all?

Mr. SMOOT. Under the same restrictions that are provided for corporations. In other words, it applies to individuals doing business and to corporations doing business.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand that.

Mr. SMOOT. It seems to me that they should be allowed, under the restrictions that are now imposed in the bill upon corporations, to withhold a part of their profits.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. SMOOT. I am expressing my opinion only.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am perfectly willing to apply to partnerships the same rule that is applied to corporations; that is to say, to require them to pay a normal tax of 6 per cent upon their total annual earnings and permit them to distribute such part as is not needed in their business and make that portion of their earnings subject in the hands of distributees to the surtax and let them retain in their business what is reasonably necessary for the conduct of their business as ascertained or determined by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Now, when you come to an individual, if you undertake to apply the same rule and subject him to a normal tax of 6 per cent and permit him to retain in his business as much as he may think is necessary to carry on the business with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, I think you will find when you have finished that you have cut your revenues from this source nearly in two. I do not believe that it would be wise to extend that to all individuals. I think if you are going to adopt this plan you ought to adjust the inequalities that will be brought about between individuals and partnerships and corporations by imposing a higher normal tax upon the corporation and the partnership and a lower normal tax upon the individual.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do.

Mr. PENROSE. The individual is not under consideration at present. I believe that his affairs could be adjusted on the same basis as that of the corporation. But be that as it may, let us take it up in due course. What is before the Senate now is the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota, and he is entirely willing to accept the 6 per cent normal and have the surplus earnings undistributed by partnerships treated in the same way as the undistributed earnings of a corporation. I would urge the chairman of the committee to accept the amendment.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, this is the beginning of what was a long story in the committee. It was sought in the committee to adjust the situation on the lines now adverted to by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. PENROSE. I thought the committee had placed partnerships on an equality with corporations.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, no.

Mr. PENROSE. My recollection was that that was the official act of the committee, but of course the chairman states otherwise, and I do not challenge his assertion.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, under the present act and under the bill a partnership pays no income tax at all. A corporation pays an income tax, an individual pays an income tax, but a partnership pays no income tax. A partnership is required under the law to distribute all its earnings among the individual partners.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will allow me to correct him, it is not required that the partnership shall distribute it, but they are compelled to pay the tax whether it is distributed or not.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will let me finish he will see what I have in mind. It is required in this way and in this sense, that whether it is distributed or not distributed, as a matter of fact the law assumes that it has been distributed and requires the individual to give it in as a part of his income, just as if it had been distributed, so as to make it at once subject not only to the income tax of the individual but to the normal tax of the individual and the surtax of the individual. So upon a partnership as such there is no tax at all as there is upon a corporation. There is a tax of 6 per cent upon a corporation's total earnings, and when those earnings are distributed and go into the hands of the shareholders they become subject to an individual income tax, both a normal tax and surtax. There is no way unless you change the law by which a partnership will pay a normal tax at all.

I can not bind the committee about it because the committee has taken no action upon it, but so far as I am individually concerned I think there is a great deal of merit and a great deal of justice in the proposition the Senator from North Dakota has presented. I think if we were to change the present law so as to subject partnerships just as we did corporations to an income tax, and fix that income tax for partnerships at the same rate we fix the income tax for corporations, namely, at 6 per cent, and then permit them to deal with their earnings just exactly as corporations are permitted to deal with their earnings; that is to say, let them distribute such portion as they do not reasonably need in the conduct of their business, and let that in the hands of the individual partner become subject to the income tax of the individual, including the surtax, if it be necessary in their case as in the case of a corporation, in the interest of the business to maintain its efficiency for the purpose if necessary of enlarging it, to retain a part without distributing it, and to let it be retained without being subject to the tax provided the Secretary of the Treasury shall find that the amount retained was reasonably necessary in the business and put them upon a parity. I would have no objection to that, but I would have serious objection to applying the same principle to individuals because I do not think it would be workable. However, if you will maintain the disparity that we have provided in the bill between the individual and the corporation as to the normal tax I think that situation would be reasonably met; that is to say, let the normal tax of the individual remain at 4 per cent as it is now and place a normal tax upon partnerships at 6 per cent just as we have laid that 6 per cent tax upon corporations.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I only wish to say in answer to the fears of the Senator from North Carolina, of course it was understood that I would move this amendment on the floor. I reserved that right in the committee and it was conceded that we would bring the matter before the Senate and determine what the action of the body would be.

Now, the Senator is fearful that the rule would not work with safety if applied to individuals as well as to partnerships. I do not think that he would find a great deal of trouble there. If the individual is conducting exactly the same kind of a business it is very easy for the department to determine what is reasonable for him to retain, and they would allow him to retain exactly the same as would be allowed to a partnership and a corporation doing the same business.

The individual, who generally is not engaged so much in that character of business in which it is very essential that something should be allowed for extensions and preparations for next year's business, would not be allowed by the department the same deductions that would be allowed corporations or partnerships in a business demanding extension.

Now let me call the Senator's attention to just one little illustration. Here is a corporation manufacturing steel rails. We already know that the business of the country is such that there is a congestion in all character of freight and that during the progress of this war we shall need more trackage, we shall need more rolling stock, and the Government would say, "If you will put this money which you have earned this year into your plant and increase its size so that you can furnish more steel rails for next year, we will not levy a tax upon those earnings." If a partnership is doing exactly the same business and for the same purpose, should not the same rule apply? I am willing to accept the proposition that you tax both alike; but I also want the exemptions to be exactly the same.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico pardon me for a moment?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. For a question.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was going to ask the Senator if this 6 per cent normal tax was applied to partnerships and they were permitted to retain surplus net earnings just as in the case of corporations, and there was this differential between individuals and partnerships and corporations in the normal tax, would the Senator think that a fair adjustment?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I was not present this afternoon during a few minutes when there was read that part of this bill which proposes to increase the normal tax upon corporations from 4 to 6 per cent. Had I been present, I should have objected to making that increase. My reasons for that objection grow out of the very situation which now presents itself to the Senate. We have here a situation which is fraught with injustice in every phase as it is dealt with in this bill. The proposal of the chairman of the committee just made intensifies what to my mind is a grave injustice. It intensifies another thing—an absolute impracticability.

Some Senators here will remember that on Tuesday of this week I took the position that the pending bill as applied to corporations is impracticable because it imposes upon the Secretary of the Treasury the duty of looking into the business of every corporation of this country, and not only of looking into the business of the corporation but going so far into its affairs as to determine the absolute necessities of the business. In order to do that, it would be necessary to increase the force of the Treasury Department by thousands of men, and it would be necessary to have experts in every line of business in the country in order to determine whether or not a particular expenditure was necessary to the business or whether it were advisable that the money be retained in the business for future use.

I have pointed out that the corporations of this country are organized with charters almost unlimited in their scope and that if they are not unlimited, by amendment, in 24 hours they can become unlimited, as every lawyer in this body knows. When the corporation attains that breadth, then there is no limitation upon the amount of money which may be retained by the corporation and legitimately used in the varied lines of business designated in the charter. So with the partnership.

Mr. President, at one time in the committee when it was proposed to levy a tax upon the undistributed earnings of corporations it was suggested that corporations engaged in production, transportation, and distribution—the three necessary functions of industrial activity—might use in their business 20 per cent without any tax. Then the question arose, "If you allow the corporation to retain 20 per cent in its business, if it is engaged in production or distribution, why should you not permit the same exemption to the partnership?" If you permit the same exemption to the partnership, then I ask you by what line of reasoning can you say that it should not be exempted as to the individual who stands upon his own foundation and transacts his own business upon his own resources? Is he not as an American citizen entitled to the same rights in this country as is a partnership or corporation? That, Mr. President, is the question in all its baldness which confronts the Senate at this time. Are you going to destroy American citizenship; to tax it out of existence; take away its property; put upon it the hard hand of taxation; and yet allow the corporation to go scot free? That is the question presented here. If you are going to permit the corporation to be exempt, if you are going to say to it, "You may keep all of your net income without the payment of this surtax," of course, you ought to say that the partnership shall have the same privilege, and you ought to say that the individual American citizen shall have the same privilege.

However, Mr. President, I realize the enormous task of supervising the business of every American citizen; I realize the task of supervising the business of the partnership and of the corporation; and so I say that the scheme now presented, and so readily accepted, is impracticable, and will take away from the Government the taxes it should have.

Take the individual who is engaged in no business and yet has a net income. He has some rights; he is willing to part with his tax. There is, however, hardly an individual in all this land who has not some business; we have very few of the leisure class in this country; our citizens are active, progressive, hard-working men, either by brain or by brawn, and they should stand upon the same level.

Mr. President, instead of hunting around for some scheme by which to exempt corporations from taxation, had we not better reverse the procedure, and try to find some scheme by which we can make them pay just taxes? Instead of trying to exempt partnerships from what is a just tax, instead of trying to exempt individuals from a just tax, is it not far better that in this time of war, when we need all the revenue we can get, that we should gather them all together and treat them all alike and make them all pay taxes? So, Mr. President, upon those considerations I have proposed an amendment which will come up on a succeeding portion of the bill.

I realize that upon the incomes of individuals and partnerships the surtaxes range from 1 per cent to over 60 per cent.

Take the great house of J. P. Morgan & Co., a partnership, earning perhaps as much as the National City Bank of the city of New York. The National City Bank goes scot-free of any taxes except the 2 per cent, but the partners in the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co., with their large earnings, have to contribute by the hundreds of thousands of dollars. You do not want the one to escape nor the other. If the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co., a partnership, earns twenty-five or fifty million dollars every year, do you want that twenty-five or fifty million dollars to go into the hands of and for the benefit of the individual partners and escape all surtaxes?

So with other important partnerships throughout the country and other important individual enterprises, do you believe that in this time of need we should permit such fortunes, such earnings, such net incomes to be accumulated and kept in the business? Do you believe that we ought to let them escape the surtaxes? Senators know the line of business in which the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. is engaged, speculating around the globe, promoting enterprises from the four corners of the earth, not confined to the Western Hemisphere—do you want to let those millions of income escape? Yet who would examine a business of that kind and undertake to say how much is reasonably necessary to be expended in the business or, in the language of the bill, to be "employed in the business"? So with many other concerns throughout the country.

Instead of trying now to give to the firms of the country the exemption which this bill proposes to give to corporations, let the Senate turn around and seek some way by which we can get a just return from the four and a half billions of dollars of net income retained by the corporations of this country which to-day escape all surtaxes. So, Mr. President, I suggest, and, if the chairman is agreeable, I should like to have the consideration of this paragraph deferred until we come to the consideration of the paragraphs of subsection (b) of section 10.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before acting upon that suggestion let me say just one word in conclusion. Never in the history of the United States has there been a period in which every business and every industry and every resource will be taxed to the limit as will be required during the next two or three years. We need not only what our present great manufacturing plants produce, but we shall need more than they can possibly produce this year. After due and thoughtful consideration it was felt by the committee that it was better to allow extensions to a reasonable degree, to form a basis and a foundation for a greater output next year, and to encourage them to bring about that result. The majority of the committee——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. McCUMBER. I shall yield in a moment. The majority of the committee determined that it was good policy to allow at least a portion, whatever was needed for the Government purposes, of the earnings of this year to go into betterments and extensions, in order that we may have a greater productivity for next year. It may be, Mr. President, that when next year comes we shall not need again to allow the same deductions for this purpose, and I shall be as ready as anyone to join with the Senator from New Mexico in imposing a heavier taxation upon undistributed profits; but we all acted according to our best judgment of what would be the best interests of this Nation for the coming one or two years. Now, therein I know I differ from the Senator from New Mexico. It is an honest difference; and therefore my position was that we should excuse a portion of these earnings if the earnings went into betterments and into extensions, the natural result of which would be a greater productivity for next year to meet the demands of the Government for next year. Now, all I am asking is that the several lines of business, no matter by whom operated, shall be accorded the same rights, the same privileges, and for the same purpose under the law. That is the only purpose of this amendment.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the point made by the Senator from North Dakota just now amounts simply to this: He has not said that the putting of a surtax upon the undistributed net earnings of a corporation would be unjust. On the other hand, it is admitted that such a tax would be a fair tax, and such a fair tax is now imposed upon individuals and partnerships. Is it so important to encourage corporations to extend their business as to warrant us in remitting and donating to them and in effect subsidizing them to the extent of a fair tax?

If it is advisable to give to these corporations this fair tax in order that they may extend their business, then, I ask, by what logic can you impose any taxes upon a corporation engaged in business? If you want to remit one fair tax, why draw a line? Why not remit them all? And nobody has risen on this floor and said that it would be unfair to levy a surtax upon the net incomes of corporations which are undistributed, which are kept in the business, precisely the same as you levy a surtax upon the net income of the partners kept in the business, or upon the net income of the individual kept in the business.

Mr. President, instead of seeking to solve this problem by permitting other governments to become slackers in this war, is it not better to eliminate the slacker? Instead of letting the corporations keep four and a half million dollars of net income free from this surtax, and adding to it the net income of partnerships, is it not better that we subject all these dollars to the payment of a tax, and make them all good dollars and worthy dollars to be continued in a worthy business, the support and maintenance of our country?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am not going to resist the proposition of the Senator from North Dakota, if he insists upon it, to let this matter go over. In my judgment, however, if the Senator is going to press his amendment, it is probably better to vote on that before we vote on the other, because I think the vote of some Senators on the second proposition will be determined very largely by the result of the vote on the Senator's amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. I did not understand whether the Senator felt that the amendment I have offered should go over, or the other amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; what I meant to say was that I thought it was probably better to vote upon the Senator's amendment first.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is my judgment.

Mr. SIMMONS. But if the Senator desires that it shall go over——

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I do not wish it to go over. I think it simply perfects the committee amendment as I would have it perfected, and I think it should be adopted before we attempt to take a final vote on the matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, of course I am not in a position to accept this amendment for the committee. It has not been acted upon by the committee so far as I remember, but I shall make no resistance on behalf of the committee. Whatever the Senate desires to do about that will be entirely satisfactory to me. But, Mr. President, before we vote, while I do not desire now to enter into any lengthy discussion of the proposition involved in this amendment and in the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico, I do think I ought to try to get the Senators to understand the real facts and the real situation.

I do not think this is a question which ought to be discussed in heat. I think it is a business question very largely. There may be elements of inequality. There are questions of expediency, too, which connect themselves to these inequalities, if they are inequalities, as the committee has finally adjusted them; but it is not a question which to my mind Senators ought to approach either in a spirit of heat or in a spirit of prejudice against corporations. I think if we come to the consideration of this question moved by feelings of that sort——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think I have disclaimed a number of times any prejudice against corporations as such. If I have not made myself clear upon that point, I hope the Senator and all others will understand it now. I have not sought to do anything against corporations except to put them upon an equal footing with individuals.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not intended to impute to the Senator any purpose of that sort; but I know, as we all know, that there is in this country among the people—we come from the people and we more or less participate in those feelings—a certain antagonism toward corporations, a certain feeling of prejudice toward them, that sometimes makes it somewhat difficult for us to deal with exact fairness toward a corporation.

Now, I want to ask Senators to look at the facts in this situation without any reference to public prejudice against corporations, with a view only to doing that thing which is just to all interests, just to the Government, and just to the business interests of the country at large.

Mr. President, it seems to me that probably the impression—not intentionally; I do not mean to say that—has been left upon Senators that the committee, in dealing with this question, has dealt with it in a spirit of favoritism toward corporate incomes; that it has dealt with it in a way that is more favorable to corporations than the legislation that is now upon our statute books. Mr. President, that is very unjust to the committee. I believe that impression has been lodged in the minds of Senators—that the committee has changed the law with regard to the taxation of corporations, and in a way more favorable to the corporations, and that this has been the result of a favoritism on the part of the committee to corporate interests in this country.

Nothing could be further from the truth, Mr. President, and nothing could be more unjust to the members of the committee, than any such impression as that, if such an impression exists in the mind of any Senator. We have had an excise tax upon corporations in this country ever since 1909. That tax was not extended to individuals until 1913. Our first income tax applied only to corporations. That condition continued from 1909 to 1913. In the present tariff act we enlarged it and broadened it, and made it apply to individuals as well as to corporations.

From the very beginning of this income tax a corporation was required to pay upon its entire corporate income a certain flat tax, namely, 2 per cent, up to 1916. It was provided in the law, after we brought in individuals in 1913, that whenever the income of the corporation was distributed among its stockholders, then it should at once become subject, in the hands of the stockholder, to the individual income tax and to the surtaxes.

That has been the law up to the present time, and is the law now. Up to the present time the corporation has not been required to distribute any part of its income. If it saw fit to retain the whole of its income in its business, it has not been required to pay any tax at all outside of the normal tax. That is the law now. That has been the law from the beginning. This committee, finding the law in that situation with reference to corporations, did not accept it. This committee felt that corporations ought to make some distribution, and this committee provided legislation which in its judgment will bring about some distribution.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] talks about this matter as if, under the present law, a corporation paid no surtax. Under the present law, as I have stated, a corporation is not required to distribute; but under the present law when a corporation does distribute, whether it be in the year in which the income was earned or in some future year, that income immediately becomes subject to the income tax of the individual and to the surtax. As a matter of fact, it has been the custom of corporations from time immemorial in this country to retain a part of their incomes, but it likewise has been the practice of corporations in this country to distribute a part of their income.

Does not every Senator here know that no corporation could continue in business many years unless it did distribute a part, and a large part, of its income? It is only through the distribution of incomes that a stockholder can get any return from his money. The suggestion here that these corporations pay no income tax or surtax now is far afield from the facts. Under the present law it is absolutely necessary, I say, in order that they may satisfy their stockholders, that they make liberal distributions; and every man who knows anything about the business of corporations in this country knows that they have been and are now making liberal distributions.

I should take it that in ordinary times, on an average, at least one-half of the incomes of corporations in this country is distributed—probably more than one-half. Probably two-thirds of the incomes of corporations are distributed. So that under the present law, if that be the proportion of the distribution—and I believe it is not far from the proportion of the distribution—at least two-thirds of this four and a half million dollars that the Senator from New Mexico talks about has been paid and is paid to-day as surtax.

There is no foundation, Mr. President, for the statement that the incomes of corporations in this country are absolutely escaping the surtax. There never has been a day since we imposed an income tax upon corporations that from one-half to two-thirds of every income has not been annually distributed and paid the surtax.

Mr. President, in the case of a corporation in these times, by reason of the fact that there is a great temptation to hold these earnings in the treasury of the company and in the business and escape taxes, a great temptation not to distribute, your committee thought it was very wise to change the law and put in some provision that would tend to force these corporations to make a liberal distribution of their annual earnings. So we said that after the corporations had distributed among their stockholders such parts of their earnings as they found necessary in order to allow the stockholders to get a reasonable return upon their money, if they retained any amount the Secretary of the Treasury should make an inquiry, and if he ascertained the fact that the amount actually retained after distribution to the stockholders was more than was necessary in the corporate business to keep it in an efficient condition to enable it to perform its great functions as one of the agencies of business and the Government more than was necessary according to the uniform practice of the corporations in times past when there was no temptation to withhold distribution for the purpose of escaping taxes, then so much of it as he found was not necessary for this purpose should become subject at once to a surtax of 10 per cent. Under the present law the matter of distribution is left absolutely to the corporation. Under the Senate committee bill it is left to the corporation in the first instance, but if they retained more than the Secretary of the Treasury finds reasonably necessary upon their business, then they pay a tax of 10 per cent upon that.

Mr. SMOOT. Fifteen per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. I believe the committee did raise it to 15 per cent by way of penalty. Then if that situation left any inequity between a corporation, a partnership, and an individual we provided for an increase in the normal tax of corporations of 2 per cent, so as to make their rate 2 per cent higher than the normal rate paid by the individual.

Now, that is the situation in which we found it and that is the situation in which we have left it. Yet, Mr. President, I say the impression is attempted to be created here that we have done something favoring corporations, when in fact we have done something to punish corporations if they shall retain their surplus for the purpose of escaping taxation. When we have done something to more equally distribute the burden as between the corporations and the individual, the impression has been sought to be created that we found the law against the corporations and changed the law in favor of the corporations.

But, Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico brought this matter to the attention of the committee and by his forceful argument led us to believe that there were some inequities; that there were some injustices; that there were some conditions that required these corrective provisions, and he offered an amendment of his own. He offered it in full realization of the fact that corporations would distribute hereafter, as they have heretofore, a large part of their incomes, and that the part so distributed at once became liable to the surtax. He offered it with the full knowledge of that, for he and other members of the committee got statistics and brought them before the committee showing the course and conduct of certain corporations in this country for many years in the past. Now, what did he provide in that amendment? He provided, first, that 20 per cent of the total annual earnings of all the corporations of the country should be exempt from any surtax. The Senator says it is gross wrong, gross injustice, and gross inequality between the partnerships and corporations to permit them to retain any part of their surplus without paying the surtax, when under his own amendment he provided for the exemption of one-fifth of all their annual incomes from the payment of the surtax which he proposed. Assuming now that 50 per cent, I will say—and I think more than 50 per cent under ordinary circumstances is distributed—an exemption of 20 per cent is provided under the Senator's amendment. You have exempted, then, 70 per cent. So you have left only 30 per cent to become subject to the surtax proposed in the Senator's amendment.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. Just let me finish this statement.

Now, Mr. President, your committee thought, as the Senator's amendment, which we had agreed to and which we incorporated in our first report of the bill to the Senate, that as 50 per cent would likely be distributed, and 20 per cent under his amendment was exempted, and only 30 per cent under any circumstances retained, if that 30 per cent was distributed, a part of it would go into the hands of stockholders who would not have to pay any surtax, because their income would not reach above the exemption from surtax in the income-tax law. Probably one-half of it would be in that situation. Then if one-half of it or one-third was in that situation, only 20 per cent would remain for distribution in the hands of people who, by virtue of the size of their incomes, would pay a surtax. The committee thought that if we put upon corporations an additional 2 per cent tax, thereby increasing their income tax $180,000,000, it would bring, in the first place, into the Treasury four or five times as much money as would come to the Treasury from the surtax upon this 30 per cent or this 20 per cent or this 10 per cent, as the case might be, and that it would leave no injustice as between the corporations and the individuals, because the corporation in its entity dealing with the property of its stockholders would already have paid a much larger amount than the surtax would amount to if they had distributed it.

Mr. President, I recognize the force of the position of the Senator from North Dakota, and I shall not detain the Senate to discuss it. He has already discussed it. Whatever action the Senate sees fit to take upon it I shall be satisfied with, but I thought it was right and proper that I should place before the Senate fully the exact situation so that the Senate when it acts upon this matter may not act without understanding the actual facts in the case.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I now offer my amendment after line 8, on page 107. The Senator in charge of the bill has spoken very truly and accurately concerning the reasons which actuated the committee in fixing the rates on corporations, in allowing them a reasonable exemption of their profits from taxation, provided that exemption went into structures or betterments or extensions which would add to their output for the next year. I agree with him and with the majority of the committee entirely upon that. All I have asked is that we shall correct the bill now, so that the same rule shall apply whether that business is carried on by a corporation or by a partnership.

The Senator from New Mexico says that about 25 per cent of the business of the country is carried on by others than corporations. While I thought it was somewhat less than that, all I want is that the same rule shall apply to this 25 per cent that applies to the other 75 per cent, and the chairman wisely makes no objection to that amendment to the provision of the bill.

So that Senators will not misunderstand the purpose of the amendment let me again call attention to subdivision (e), on page 106, which reads:

(e) Persons carrying on business in partnership shall be liable for income tax only in their individual capacity, and the share of the profits of the partnership to which any taxable partner would be entitled if the same were divided, whether divided or otherwise, shall be returned for taxation and the tax paid under the provisions of this title.

So a partnership in business pays through the individuals a tax upon every dollar earned, though it may be earned in the same business that is conducted by a corporation and be put into the business again for betterments and extensions for exactly the same purpose. I want to apply that rule equitably. I read then what is granted to the corporation. This is the exemption that is granted to the corporation:

The tax imposed by this subdivision shall not apply to that portion of such undistributed net income which is actually invested and employed in the business or is retained for employment in the reasonable requirements of the business: Provided, That if the Secretary of the Treasury ascertains and finds that any portion of such amount so retained at any time for employment in the business is not so employed or is not reasonably required in the business a tax of 15 per cent shall be levied.

So you will see if we add this provision to copartnerships their penalties will be exactly the same and they will be compelled to pay their tax upon the undistributed profits. I think we shall have no difficulty in agreeing to a further amendment that if the corporation pays 6 per cent the partnership shall pay 6 per cent, if the corporation pays 4 per cent the partnership shall pay the same, and that the tax shall be the same if the partnership retains the earnings in the business and the penalty the same. But we can take only one step at a time and I offer this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 107, after line 8, insert:

The tax imposed by this subdivision shall not apply to that portion of such undistributed net income which is actually invested and employed in the business or is retained for employment in the reasonable requirements of the business: Provided, That if the Secretary of the Treasury ascertains and finds that any portion of such amount so retained at any time for employment in the business is not so employed or is not reasonably required in the business a tax of 15 per cent shall be levied.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the amendment is only presented this afternoon and it has not been printed and Senators have not had an opportunity to read it into the bill to see whether it would bring about the result which even the Senator from North Dakota is seeking without doing some injustice somewhere else, I ask that the amendment may be printed and lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I would suggest also that some member of the committee inform the Senate to-morrow, if he can, about how much revenue is going to be lost to the Government by this amendment. I do not know that it is possible to determine it, but there can be an estimate perhaps approximating the amount.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator that the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico was originally adopted by the committee, and that amendment I understand he is offering now.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Michigan has reference to my amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I beg pardon; I thought he was speaking about the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I think it will be next to impossible to tell what the revenue will be from partnership, because in the existing law the reports are returned as individuals of the partnerships. Any estimate would be the wildest kind of a guess to say whether it would affect the revenue to any extent or not.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator believe that it would affect it to a great extent?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not think it is going to affect it to a great extent in partnerships, because there are so few of them in the United States that they can be looked after very closely by the department, and in their annual return they will have to state exactly the amount of gain of the partnership not as an individual, and then if there is any question arising in the mind of the officials regarding the return the department will make a investigation.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the amendment provide for simply partnerships, or partnerships and individuals?

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment applies only to partnerships.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to inquire whether an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota would be in order. I offer an amendment to his amendment and ask that it be printed and go over with his amendment. I will state that my amendment inserts after the word "income" this proviso:

Not exceeding 5 per cent of the capital and surplus previously invested in the business.

That is to say, I do not think any partnership or corporation ought to have exemptions greater than 5 per cent of its surplus, but I do believe that every corporation and every partnership ought to be permitted to follow the ordinary judicious lines of business and accumulate during each year a reasonable surplus to its capital stock. That is the law of growth and it is the law of business, and that natural addition should be exempted from this taxation.

I will ask to have my amendment printed, and I shall propose it to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. It would change the whole scheme of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course the Senator in charge of the bill is not going to ask for a vote to-night.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will state that my amendment goes further than that. I strike out the dangerous powers and the impracticable powers given to the Secretary of the Treasury to exercise a censorship over the business of the country. I do not believe that it is proper that the Secretary of the Treasury should be given the power to decide for individuals how much or how little they should add to their surplus each year.

I believe that the law ought to state how much they can add and that everything above that should be subjected to taxation.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, if that is going to be considered at all, I want to be heard upon it. I will simply say now—and later, when the bill is again up for consideration, I shall discuss the matter further—that rather than have the Jones amendment as it was originally agreed to by the committee, personally I should prefer to strike out all this portion of the bill and insert a provision requiring every corporation in the United States to retain 20 per cent of its profits each year. There have been more failures of corporations in the United States by too great a distribution of so-called profits than there have been from any one cause, with the single exception of incompetency.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I ask the Senator from Utah to name one instance in the whole history of the business of this country where any successful business concern ever suffered any disaster by reason of distributing what was actually net income. I submit that the failures referred to by the Senator were where such concerns drew upon their imagination and distributed as income that which was not income. I ask the Senator to name a single instance in the history of this country where any concern ever went bankrupt by reason of distributing only net income.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there are so many of such instances that it would take me from now until the end of this year to name them. I want to call the attention of the Senator to this fact: The profits which it is said most corporations are making to-day are mostly book profits. Their profits are going into brick and mortar; they are going into machinery; they are going into extensions and into betterments; they are going into extended credits. Profits in many cases have been made as goods of all kinds, merchandise of every character, have been advancing in value by leaps and bounds, and every advance shows upon the books of the company as profits, we must remember. The Government of the United States will not take bricks and mortar for taxes imposed by this bill; it will not take book accounts for them. The Government will not accept improvements and extensions for the payment of taxes imposed upon the companies making them. No, Mr. President, and when the war ceases, instead of prices of all classes of goods advancing they are going to fall. God help any business which now, while it is making book profits, does not provide for that certain result when the war is over, for nothing on earth can save it from absolute bankruptcy.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Net income under this proposed statute is well defined. Before you have any net income you deduct everything that is necessary to be deducted on account of depreciation, on account of use, and all that is necessary to repair, maintain, and replace. Mere book profits, I submit, will not be shown up by a single concern in all this country as subject to this income tax. Between now and to-morrow morning I want the Senator from Utah to rack his brain, and I challenge him to present the name of a single business concern in all this land that ever went bankrupt because of distributing only net income.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, buildings and machinery can not be deducted; improvements can not. I was a stockholder of one corporation that failed because of the fact that it declared a dividend upon what it thought it actually had, and yet there was an account of $40,000 that became absolutely worthless within 10 days. Nobody knew the financial condition of that concern caused by it entering into a losing contract. Bradstreet did not know it; Dun & Co. did not know it; the company extending credit did not know it; and it lost over $40,000 that was considered absolutely safe. Do you think that the Treasury of the United States would have allowed an account like that to be deducted from the net profits of the company? It is nonsense to think so.

Mr. President, talk about one company, why, there are so many which have failed for the cause I have stated in the history of the business of the United States that it would take not one man but a hundred men years to name them. When you take into consideration that nearly 90 per cent of all the business organizations in this country fail between the time that they organize and 25 years afterwards there must be some reason for it. If the Senator from New Mexico has been in business, he knows what the reason is. He knows, Mr. President, that book accounts get old, they pile up, and unforeseen losses occur.

Take the Bethlehem Steel Co. which we heard so much talk about yesterday. Its profits have been large, as has been shown; but when the war closes it will be found that 40 per cent of the profits have been put into machinery, into betterments, into buildings and extensions which will not be worth 10 cents on the dollar. There will be 40 per cent of all their machinery lying idle. That will not only be true of the Bethlehem Steel Co. but it will also be true of the munition manufacturers and of the great steel concerns. The Senator from New Mexico, as a member of the Committee on Finance, knows that one of the officials of the War Department stated that an estimate had been made asking for an appropriation of $15,000,000 to buy machinery and to erect buildings in which to make the guns that we shall require in this war. The concerns which were expected to make these guns claim it is impossible for them to get the money to erect the buildings and to buy the machinery, and therefore Congress is asked to appropriate $15,000,000 for that purpose, and I say now it will be appropriated.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I ask the Senator from Utah if it would not be better for the Federal Treasury to appropriate $15,000,000, or ten times $15,000,000, for that purpose than to remit 10 per cent on the four and a half billion dollars, or $450,000,000, on all the corporations of the country who do not need any appropriation? Had we not better let the Government build its own munition factories than to remit $450,000,000 of just taxes, and let the Government own the property that it buys with its money? Does not the Senator believe that that would be better?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah does not believe that any such thing will ever happen or could happen as the Senator from New Mexico now says would happen. The Senator from Utah does not believe that there are $4,500,000,000 of undistributed dividends in this country.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I almost demonstrated that in the speech which I made here last Tuesday, and I invite the Senator from Utah to kindly read that speech and to consider the evidence which I then presented. I submitted the evidence to the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico submitted his evidence in this way: He took a book and selected about 20 companies which had made fabulous profits since the war, and, forsooth, because they had not distributed more than 50 per cent of their net earnings, the Senator took it for granted that the $9,000,000,000 profits made by the hundreds of thousands of corporations had been distributed in the same ratio.

Why, Mr. President, most of the corporations in this country—the great bulk of them—are distributing dividends this year just the same as they have always distributed dividends. Many of them have distributed too much. Not only that, Mr. President, but as to the very concerns which have made these enormous profits, what are they actually doing to increase their plants to meet the demands of the people? Borrowing money from every source where it is possible to get it. Why did the Bethlehem Steel Co. declare a stock dividend, much of it made before the war? The Senator from New Mexico knows they only had $20,000,000 of capital, and, in order to enlarge its plants to meet the demand for war material made upon it, it had to increase the capital stock because of the fact that the banks would and should not advance more money to them with only $20,000,000 capital when their requirements were many, many times that amount?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Does the Senator believe that the Bethlehem Steel Co. ought to receive a donation of just taxes from the Federal Treasury?

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator from Utah does not believe any such thing. The Bethlehem Steel Co. under this bill will not be in any way, shape, or form relieved from any just taxation. The Bethlehem Steel Co., if this bill passes, in the first place, will have taken from its war profits nearly 55 per cent of all that it makes during the fiscal year 1917, and then the other 45 per cent that will be declared in the shape of dividends to stockholders will be assessed under the income-tax provisions; if there is a stockholder whose income amounts to more than a million dollars, we will take from him another 60 per cent of what he receives; and before even these taxes are imposed, Mr. President, there is a normal tax of 6 per cent upon all the profits of the company. We can not impose taxes that will take every dollar out of the business concerns and have those concerns do what the American people require of them. Every government in the world has learned that lesson; and here we are just at the beginning of the war imposing greater taxes and more of them than any other government has ever imposed upon business.

Mr. HITCHCOCK and Mr. KELLOGG addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Do I understand the Senator to be opposed to the provision of my amendment giving immunity from taxation to the amount of 5 per cent of capital and surplus?

Mr. SMOOT. I think it would be most unfortunate, I will say to the Senator. It never ought to be limited to 5 per cent. For instance, take the railroads of this country. Under the direction of the Interstate Commerce Commission they are compelled to make certain betterments and improvements——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Not to the extent of over 5 per cent of their capital and surplus.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, Mr. President, the railroads of this country for the last 10 or 20 years have retained close to 50 per cent, and I believe on an average over 50 per cent of their profits; and yet, Mr. President, we all know that they have been compelled to borrow, borrow, borrow in order that they may extend their lines and make improvements and increase their rolling stock that the business of the country demands.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Possibly the Senator from Utah misunderstands the purport of my amendment. I do not propose an exemption of 5 per cent of the annual profits; I propose to permit the corporations to set aside an amount which shall equal 5 per cent of their invested capital and surplus.

Mr. SMOOT. That, Mr. President, is what I thought the Senator's amendment provided. In other words, the Senator proposes to say to the corporations of the country that they can only set aside 5 per cent of their earnings without having them subjected to taxation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; the Senator is in error; he misunderstands the purport of my amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. It was read by the Secretary, but the confusion was so great I could scarcely hear. What does the amendment provide?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not talking about 5 per cent of the earnings; I am leaving the corporations of the country to add to their surplus each year without extra taxation an amount which shall equal 5 per cent of the capital and surplus invested. The Senator talks about 5 per cent of earnings; that is an entirely different matter. My amendment proposes to allow them to set aside an amount equal to 5 per cent of their capital and surplus. That has been decided by experience to be a reasonable amount under which corporations can grow and expand and meet the future needs of business.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator takes the capital stock and the surplus, then, of course, the 5 per cent in the case, for instance, of the railroads would take nearly all of their profits. I do not know but what they ought to be permitted to do that, being under the absolute control of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to how they shall run their roads and as to the charges they shall make for freight, and so forth.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator will realize that we are confronted with a certain danger. There is a danger that great corporations making very large earnings will set aside to surplus too excessive an amount for the purpose of cheating the Government out of the income tax. That would be obviated by giving immunity only to 5 per cent. Then, on the other hand, we are confronted with the desirability of permitting the actual working capital of the corporations to be increased each year by an addition to the surplus, and we should not penalize that addition, so far as it is reasonable, by imposing extraordinary taxes on it. That is the purport of my amendment, and while I have offered it to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], I intend also to offer it to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] if that comes before the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is so late to-night that I do not care to discuss the question any further; but the Senator's amendment will be printed by morning and we can then see just what it does provide.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska if he takes into consideration the actual investment made, the actual capital paid in and invested, or the capital as it has been watered in a great many corporations?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have provided that it shall be actual capital invested in the business, capital and surplus, and that is provided for by the blanks which the Treasury Department furnishes. It has been provided for in the future and the Secretary of the Treasury has ample power through his inquisitors to see that that is not excessively stated.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is going to be a very important inquiry, undoubtedly, if we go into that, because a great many of these corporations are capitalized at many times their real value——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not speaking of capital; I am speaking of investment.

Mr. FLETCHER. And 5 per cent of that, as the Senator from Utah suggests, would probably relieve them of all taxes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is pretty well understood as to all these corporations what the actual capital and surplus invested are.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, has the amendment been printed?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will have it printed in the morning.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico desires that this matter go over until to-morrow, and I am willing that it shall take that course.

PETITIONS.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Alhambra, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide for the return of our soldier dead to their home burial grounds in a sanitary and recognizable condition, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MARTIN. I present resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Suffolk, Va., which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce of Suffolk, Va., a body created and maintained for the commercial, industrial, and economic development of Suffolk and vicinity, and including in its membership the leading citizens, firms, and corporations of the commercial and professional activities of the city, desires to express its sense of patriotic duty in this time of war with a foreign government, and to offer, as a public body, every facility which the chamber of commerce may have to the Government of the United States in any of its branches, and to put at the disposal of the Government of the United States the services of the chamber of commerce and its entire membership in any capacity of work which the Government of the United States may delegate to the chamber of commerce.

Be it further resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, to the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, to the two United States Senators from Virginia, and to the Member of Congress from the second district of Virginia.

Approved.

W. B. FERGERSON,
President Chamber of Commerce, Suffolk, Va.

CARYL SPILLER,
Secretary Chamber of Commerce, Suffolk, Va.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CURTIS:

A bill (S. 2817) making it unlawful for any common carrier, or the manager, agent, or employee of any common carrier, or the proprietor, lessee, manager, agent, or employee of any inn, hotel, restaurant, theater, or public place of entertainment or amusement to forbid or refuse transportation, admission, accommodation or service, or make any discrimination against any officer or enlisted man who is in the military or naval service of the United States Government, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 2818) for the relief of Charles W. Franklin (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 2819) granting a pension to Anna F. Baugh; and

A bill (S. 2820) granting an increase of pension to Alfonzo Shafer; to the Committee on Pensions.

NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a communication from John Skelton Williams, Comptroller of the Currency, addressed to Hon. William G. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury, stating the condition of the national banks.

There being no objection, the communication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, August 21, 1917.

Hon. WM. G. MCADOO,
Secretary of the Treasury.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I am sure that it will be gratifying to you to know what the figures tell us as to the improvement which has taken place among the banks of the national banking system as a result to a large extent of an improved system of national-bank examination, of greater thoroughness in these examinations, and from the policy of insisting that the national banks shall observe the provisions of the national-bank act, intended for their protection and the protection of their depositors and shareholders.

I have before me a statement of national-bank failures for the fiscal years from July 1, 1897, to June 30, 1917.

The average losses to depositors for this entire period was reported at nine-thousandths of 1 per cent of total deposits. The year ending July 1, 1914, 19 national banks failed, with estimated resulting losses to depositors of $1,505,000, or eighteen-thousandths of 1 per cent.

The following year, ending June 30, 1915 (the first full year under the present comptroller), there were only 16 national banks failed, with estimated loss to depositors of $441,000, or five-thousandths of 1 per cent.

The next year, ending June 30, 1916, there were 15 national-bank failures, the estimated losses being reduced to $352,000, or three-thousandths of 1 per cent, while for the year ending June 30, 1917, there were only 6 national-bank failures, estimated losses being $369,000, or three-thousandths of 1 per cent.

It is interesting to note that although the losses have declined from $1,505,000 for the year ending June 30, 1914, to $369,000 during the past fiscal year, deposits in the same period have grown from $8,185,000,000 in 1914 to $12,769,000,000 at the present time.

Although the deposits in the national banks at this time are approximately 100 per cent more than they were just 10 years ago, the sum total of losses for the past 12 months is less than one-half of what it was for either of the three years ending June 30, 1908, 1909, or 1910, and about one-seventh of what they amounted to for the year ending June 30, 1906.

There are grounds for hoping that we may be able to reduce still further the numbers of national banks failing per annum and to increase the percentage paid to depositors of those that have to go into liquidation.

I also have the pleasure of reporting that there are at this time in operation in the United States 7,653 national banks, a greater number than ever before reported in the history of the national banking system, and we have in the office under investigation applications for approximately 175 additional charters for national banks.

Faithfully, yours,

JOHN SKELTON WILLIAMS.

RECESS.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is getting tolerably late, Mr. President, and a great many Senators have gone away. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m., Friday, August 24, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, August 25, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, August 24, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Teach us, O Lord, how to be humble and yet to be firm in our convictions; how to be meek, yet to be courageous; how to be wise, yet to be teachable; how to be just, yet to be merciful; how to enjoy personal liberty, and yet not to infringe upon the rights of others; how to protect our inherent rights, and yet to do unto others as we would be done by, and so fulfill the law and the prophets through Him who taught us the way and the truth and the life. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, August 21, 1917, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following bills, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2785. An act to authorize and empower the Southwest Louisiana Waterways Association, of the State of Louisiana, to construct a lock and dam in Mermentau River, in the State of Louisiana; and

S. 2437. An act to provide for the acquisition of an air-station site for the United States Navy.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following Senate bills were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the appropriate committees named below:

S. 2785. An act to authorize and empower the Southwest Louisiana Waterways Association, of the State of Louisiana, to construct a lock and dam in Mermentau River, in the State of Louisiana; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 2437. An act to provide for the acquisition of an air-station site for the United States Navy; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

BUSINESS ON WEDNESDAY.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, before I move to adjourn it may not be out of place for me to make a statement in reference to the purpose of Mr. KITCHIN in calling the House together for work on next Wednesday. I have a telegram from him asking me to send out notices for all Members to be here on next Wednesday, as there is a probability that the revenue bill will be over for action at that time. In addition to that, the new bond bill is to be considered by the Committee on Ways and Means on Monday and possibly reported on Tuesday. I am informed by the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that the insurance bill will probably be ready to be considered by next Wednesday and be introduced next Tuesday——

Mr. ADAMSON. It has already been introduced.

Mr. GARNER. And probably will be ready to be reported next Tuesday. The deficiency bill is in the Committee on Appropriations and probably will be ready by the time we get through with these various measures that I have mentioned. Therefore I take it that that is the reason Mr. KITCHIN thought next Wednesday would be a proper time.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARNER. Certainly.

Mr. WINGO. Do I understand from the gentleman's statement that there would be no resumption of business before next Wednesday?

Mr. GARNER. On next Wednesday. When we adjourn to-day we will adjourn to meet on Tuesday.

Mr. WINGO. Then it is intended on Tuesday to adjourn until Wednesday under the same agreement?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. I will.

Mr. GILLETT. Does the gentleman think that if the revenue bill does not reach the House, which, of course, all Members will see from the papers, there will be other business ready on Wednesday?

Mr. GARNER. Well, there is a possibility if not a probability. I do not know just how long it will take the Committee on Ways and Means to consider the bond bill. The chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has just told me that he hoped to have his bill ready for report on Tuesday.

Mr. GILLETT. That committee has not met yet, I understand.

Mr. GARNER. They have had hearings without succeeding in getting a quorum. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

ADJOURNMENT.

The motion of Mr. GARNER was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until Tuesday, August 28, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War, submitting an estimate of appropriation required by the War Department for the fiscal year 1918 (H. Doc. No. 346); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of Commerce, submitting an estimate of appropriation required by the Department of Commerce for the fiscal year 1918 for enlarging and improving the lighthouse depot, fifth lighthouse district, Portsmouth, Va. (H. Doc. No. 347); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War, submitting an estimate of appropriation required by the War Department for the fiscal year 1918 (H. Doc. No. 348); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War, submitting an estimate of appropriation required by the War Department for the fiscal year 1918 (H. Doc. No. 349); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 5824) to prevent the use interstate by railroad employees in summer time of uniforms intended for winter use; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. McKEOWN: A bill (H. R. 5825) regulating the issuance of coyprights, etc., to authors, writers, correspondents, and others who have gained certain information while in the employment of and under pay from the Government; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. GOULD: A bill (H. R. 5826) to amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. McKEOWN: A bill (H. R. 5827) requiring the filing of certain information by associations, societies, leagues, gatherings, or individuals who seek to influence legislation or public opinion by means of propaganda or written communication from their officers, members, or friends; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CARY: A bill (H. R. 5828) to give to those now serving on the exemption boards throughout the United States a commission in the United States Reserve Corps without compensation; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. McARTHUR: A bill (H. R. 5829) forbidding the use of the United States mails to newspapers, magazines, and periodicals published in the language of any country with which the United States is now, or may hereafter be at war, or any ally of such country, unless the publisher of the same shall also print parallel columns containing correct English translations; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. WINGO: A bill (H. R. 5830) to extend the franking privilege to soldiers and sailors serving in the Army and Navy during the present war with Germany; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. BLANTON: A bill (H. R. 5831) to amend section 5197, Revised Statutes of the United States, regulating the rate of interest which may be charged by national banking associations and providing a penalty for violations; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. SMITH of Idaho: A bill (H. R. 5832) to prevent opposition to organized government and the unlawful destruction of property, and to provide punishment therefor; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BLANTON: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 144) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to expend funds in New Mexico and Texas for drainage purposes; to the Committee on Appropriations.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BRAND: A bill (H. R. 5833) granting six months' pay to Ida Cottrell Hodgson, the widow of Frederick Grady Hodgson, deceased, colonel, United States Army, retired; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CLARK of Missouri: A bill (H. R. 5834) granting an increase of pension to George C. Elliott; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HASTINGS: A bill (H. R. 5835) making an appropriation to compensate Samuel Grant for pay, bounty, and clothing pay while in the service of the Government of the United States; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. KINKAID: A bill (H. R. 5836) granting an increase of pension to Robert M. Dickson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TEMPLETON: A bill (H. R. 5837) granting an increase of pension to Samuel Cooper; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WOODYARD: A bill (H. R. 5838) granting an increase of pension to Nelson D. Madden; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER (by request): Resolutions adopted by German subjects, permanent residents of Missouri, loyal to the United Stated of America, its institutions and Government, and who, prior to the declaration of war between the United States and Germany, had taken active steps to acquire American citizenship, urging appropriate legislation to remove the naturalization disability of German subjects who had filed their intention or petition for naturalization prior to the declaration of war; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Also (by request), petition of members of the Celtic American League, urging freedom for Ireland at the final peace conference; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also (by request), petition of citizens of New York City, favoring the national woman's suffrage amendment; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also (by request), memorial adopted at a mass meeting of the ex-Union and Confederate soldiers and members of the Relief Corps, Woodward, Okla., pledging loyalty and support to the President and the Nation during the present war; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also (by request), petition of City Council of Plattsmouth, Nebr., urging Bohemian independence at the end of the war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also (by request), petition of Home Defense League of the Sixth Police Precinct of Washington, D. C., asking for more police protection for the city of Washington and an increase in salary for the Metropolitan police force of said city; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also (by request), petition of sundry citizens of Louisville, Ky., protesting against arrest of suffragist pickets; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BROWNING: Petition of the 75 members of Blue Anchor Grange, No. 166, Patrons of Husbandry, Blue Anchor, N. J., praying that the Government import nitrate of soda to sell to farmers and the fertilizer trade at a reasonable price, to cheapen all forms of ammoniates, and hence all fertilizers, to enable farmers to plant a maximum acreage and produce a maximum crop in 1918; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, petition of Williamstown Grange, No. 85, Patrons of Husbandry, Williamstown, N. J., favoring importation by the United States Government of nitrate of soda to sell to farmers and fertilizer trade at a reasonable price, thereby to cheapen all forms of ammoniates and hence all fertilizers, to emble farmers to plant and produce a maximum crop in 1918; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, petition of the 250 members of Swedesboro Grange, No. 5, Patrons of Husbandry, Swedesboro, N. J., praying that the Government import nitrate of soda to sell to farmers and the fertilizer trade at a reasonable price, to cheapen all forms of ammoniates, and hence all fertilizers, to enable farmers to plant and produce a maximum crop in 1918; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. CARY: Petition of Motor Vehicle Publishing Co., protesting against increase in second-class postage rates; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of Federated Trades Council of Milwaukee, Wis., favoring investigation of the claim of English domination of the American press; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, petition of the Wisconsin Agriculturist, of Racine, Wis., favoring a tax on excess profits of newspapers and opposing increase in postal rates; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. DALE of New York: Petition of the Forty-second Street Association of New York, favoring exemption of moneys received from rents from excess profits tax; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of John S. Sills & Sons, of New York City, N. Y., favoring tax on out-of-town letters and opposing tax on drop letters and postals; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of Eastman, Dillon & Co., protesting against amending the revenue laws by prohibiting tax-free covenants; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of the Naval Consulting Board, favoring legislation to prevent the publication of patents during the war; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. FOSTER: Petition of women's organization of the State Council of Defense of Illinois; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island: Petition of Primitive Methodist Church, Rev. W. B. Taylor, pastor, Lonsdale, R. I., favoring passage of national prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petitions of the Monahan Vehicle Co., Narragansett Brewing Co., the Bottlers' Union, L. Sweet & Co., and Local 166, Brewery Workmen, all of Providence, R. I., and Edward Mee & Son, of Woonsocket, R. I., protesting against passage of national prohibition legislation; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petitions of 4,000 American citizens of the third congressional district of Rhode Island, urging the passage of legislation to compel unnaturalized foreigners to fight for this country or deport them to the country from which they came; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. LUNN: Resolution of Alderman Williams and the Common Council of Schenectady, N. Y., that the common council subscribes to the general principle of the Declaration of Independence that governments derive their "just powers from the consent of the governed," and urges upon the President and Congress of the United States the necessity of making provision for the independence of Ireland and Poland, as well as the rights of the peoples and nationalities in all parts of the world to determine by the votes of their citizens to whom they will bear allegiance; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. WINGO: Petition of citizens of Scott County, Ark., favoring the abolishment of the national forest reserve in Arkansas and the opening of the same to settlement; to the Committee on Agriculture.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, August 25, 1917.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, August 15, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

WAR REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there are but four Senators in the Chamber. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson, Cal.	McNary	Sheppard
Brandegee	Jones, Wash.	Myers	Simmons
Curtis	Kellogg	Overman	Smoot
Dillingham	La Follette	Page
Fletcher	Lodge	Pittman
Hardwick	McCumber	Saulsbury

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Twenty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. HARDING, Mr. JONES of New Mexico, Mr. NEW, Mr. NORRIS, Mr. SHAFROTH, Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. SMITH of Maryland, and Mr. THOMPSON answered to their names when called.

Mr. JAMES, Mr. GERRY, Mr. COLT, Mr. BORAH, Mr. KENYON, Mr. NELSON, Mr. FRANCE, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. HALE, Mr. NEWLANDS, Mr. HITCHCOCK, Mr. KIRBY, Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. KENDRICK, Mr. HUSTING, Mr. MARTIN, Mr. HOLLIS, Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. WEEKS, Mr. STERLING, Mr. VARDAMAN, Mr. SMITH of Michigan, Mr. BECKHAM, Mr. TRAMMELL, and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. HUSTING. I desire to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] are detained on official business.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I regret to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], is absent from the Senate to-day on account of illness.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, in presenting the amendment which I offered yesterday I find that reading from a copy of what I intended to introduce as an amendment the copy had not been completed; that the last sentence of the paragraph had not been included in the typewritten amendment. I intended in my amendment to introduce exactly the same words applying to partnerships as apply to corporations, on page 112, lines 5 to 15, inclusive. I ask permission to reoffer the amendment in the form in which I desire it to appear.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 107 it is proposed to amend the committee amendment by adding, after line 8, the following:

> The tax imposed by this subdivision shall not apply to that portion of such undistributed net income which is actually invested and employed in the business or is retained for employment in the reasonable requirements of the business: Provided, That if the Secretary of the Treasury ascertains and finds that any portion of such amount so retained at any time for employment in the business is not so employed or is not reasonably required in the business a tax of 15 per cent shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid thereon, and the finding and ruling of the Secretary of the Treasury in any and all such cases shall be conclusive and final.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I was under the impression that the Senator from New Mexico and the Senator from North Dakota had consented that this part of the bill might go over, and I supposed if it went over it would not be taken up until a later time than to-day. I announced to a number of Senators that we would take up this morning the section relating to postal rates. Senators have stayed for the purpose of discussing that section to-day, and I should like very much to take it up.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Let me say that whatever arrangement the chairman in charge of the bill has seen fit to make is entirely agreeable to me.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator from North Carolina will yield to me for a moment, personally I would have no objection to taking up the postal section of the bill to-day. In fact, the earlier we can take it up the better I would be pleased personally, but I do not regard it as just to the Post Office Department to present that matter accurately to the Senate as thin as the Senate is. While technically we have a quorum present, we apparently have not more than 50 Senators here, and will not be able to maintain a quorum of the Senate to-day. Of course I will not engage in a controversy of any sort with my friend the Senator from North Carolina, and if he insists upon it I will take the day myself, and then on Monday I will start over again.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator he will have as good an audience to-day as has at any time developed during the debate.

Mr. HARDWICK. The attendance has already developed, as the Senator knows.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think we have as many as we ordinarily have at the beginning of a session.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senate must vote on this postal question.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not anticipate a vote to-day.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator will just put me to useless physical labor, as I am going to proceed on Monday.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator I would not insist upon taking it up, but the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] has stayed over at great inconvenience for the purpose of its consideration to-day, and he wants to go away on Monday. If the Senator is not ready to proceed——

Mr. HARDWICK. I am ready to proceed, but I will have to proceed again on Monday.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is exceedingly difficult to adjust our program to suit all Senators. I am very anxious to accommodate all Senators here if I possibly can, but I think the matter we were discussing yesterday evening is a matter that ought to go over. I think the committee would like to consider the amendments offered both by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. The committee have been discussing them informally this morning. I think it is a matter sufficiently serious to justify the committee in taking it up before it is again brought to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, the postal matters are of even more serious importance to the country, in my judgment. I think, in fact, a great department of the Government takes the same view of it.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator does not understand me. There is no new matter involved in that, while the proposition I refer to has not been submitted to the committee and received its action. I am talking now about a new proposition which was considered yesterday.

Mr. HARDWICK. I understand that the committee acted once or twice on the proposition of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is not the proposition of the Senator from New Mexico that we are now talking about; it is the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. SIMMONS. The amendment is a very important one and proposes to place corporations and partnerships upon the same parity with reference to income taxes and surtaxes.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will say further to the Senator there is an additional reason why I do not want to proceed with the postal sections to-day. The First Assistant Postmaster General, who is my main adviser, has been called from the city by a death in his family.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] is ready to proceed.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to say to the Senator from North Carolina that my plans are changed so that it will be necessary for me to leave Washington to-night. I am prepared to go on and discuss this proposition, but it is possible that a vote may not be obtained to-day and it is possible that I may not be able to get back Monday morning. I think it is essential from my own standpoint that I should be here when the vote is taken.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator from Massachusetts desire to take the floor now?

Mr. WEEKS. I am perfectly willing to take the floor if the matter can be brought to a vote to-day, but I am not going to do it otherwise, at least I would prefer not to do it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course I can not give an assurance to the Senator. Yesterday evening when we adjourned I was under the impression from a conversation I had with the Senator from Georgia that he would be ready to go on this morning.

Mr. HARDWICK. I would have been but for the absence of the Post Office Department official.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. There are a great many Senators away from Washington to-day, and I think there was some kind of a general understanding—I do not mean a formal understanding, but that was the impression—that there would be no vote taken to-day on any question.

Mr. SIMMONS. I had no such understanding.

Mr. PENROSE. No; the chairman of the committee had not, but there was a thought of that kind.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] do not desire or are not willing to go on to-day I know of nothing now in connection with the pending bill that we can take up. Everything has gone over by consent except this matter. I permitted everything to go over by consent, Mr. President, because I supposed this subject would be taken up.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. I am perfectly willing to go on and discuss this matter; but should I do so, I may have to do it all over again.

Mr. HARDWICK. So may I, for that matter; but the Senator from North Carolina knows that from the beginning I did not prefer this course; I asked him not to take it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I know that and I am not blaming the Senator from Georgia at all.

Mr. HARDWICK. No.

Mr. SIMMONS. Except that it puts us in the position of having nothing before the Senate.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator from North Carolina, Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There must be better order preserved in the Chamber. The Chair can not hear anything that is going on. It is impossible to hear.

Mr. HARDWICK. Almost the last thing the Senator from North Carolina said yesterday afternoon, as the RECORD this morning discloses, was that we would continue this morning the discussion on the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], and the amendment to that amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

Mr. SIMMONS. If I said that, it was an inadvertence.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is in the RECORD. I read it in the RECORD.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not understand it in that way. I thought I said to the Senator that we would take this up, and if I said what he has stated it was a pure inadvertence. Mr. President, I do not know of anything to do in connection with the pending bill——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. SIMMONS. And, Mr. President, if no Senator is prepared to go on I will consent to have the bill laid aside temporarily.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Before the Senator from North Carolina asks that that be done, I suggest why not dispose of the pending amendment?

Mr. SIMMONS. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. MCCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. As I have stated to the Senator, that is a very important matter, and I should myself prefer to consider it further and to have the committee further consider it.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Very well.

HOURS OF LABOR IN LUMBER INDUSTRY.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, while Senators are considering the course of procedure in connection with the pending bill, I desire to have a telegram read, which I have just received.

Mr. President, we have had called to our attention industrial difficulties in some of the Western States. There is quite a demand in the State of Washington upon the part of the laboring people in the lumber mills and by some of the lumber manufacturers for the establishment of an eight-hour day in the lumber industry. Many of our people think that Congress has authority to do that. The lumber manufacturers are agreeable to an eight-hour day if it can be made general throughout the country, contending, however, that unless it is made general they can not survive the competition that would come from other States not operating under that system. They seem to think, and the laboring people seem to think, that Congress has the power and jurisdiction to establish an eight-hour day for labor in lumber manufacturing plants as it did in connection with the railroads engaged in interstate commerce.

They have expressed the view that, as Congress has established an eight-hour day for railroad men engaged in interstate commerce, Congress also has the power to establish an eight-hour day for labor in the lumber-manufacturing plants of the country. I know that there is a very decided difference of opinion with reference to the power of Congress in that respect. There is powerful opinion to the effect that labor in a lumber mill is not engaged in interstate commerce and can be regulated only by the State. Bills have been introduced, however, in Congress looking to this end. Personally I should like to see an eight-hour day established. If Congress has the power to do it, it would be better to have a general policy rather than one in one State and one in another; but the question as to the power of Congress to do it is a very serious and a very important one, and I know that there would be very much discussion if the matter should come up in the Senate. I am sure it is practically impossible to do it by September 1, if at this session. With that statement I want to ask to have read a very significant telegram.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEATTLE, WASH., August 25, 1917.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
Washington, D. C.:

Seattle Building Trades Council, in line with other labor and civic organizations, request the eight-hour day in timber industry after September 1. Product of mills which have not conceded the eight-hour day and right to organize will not be handled by building-trades mechanics. Please bring this to attention of Washington delegation in Congress.

FRANK W. COTTERILL, Secretary.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I simply desire to say that I have called the matter to the attention, not only in this way but by letters, of the members of the Washington delegation and also to the attention of the President of the United States and of the Council of National Defense.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, as the Senator from Washington has presented this telegram, indicating that the laborers in the mills desire an eight-hour day, I should like to have the Senator inform us whether or not the statement is true which appeared in the press yesterday that all of the lumber mills on the Pacific coast, except the shingle mills, were proposing to close down their business until 1918 because there was no demand for their product.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have no information with respect to that matter except the dispatches which I saw in the newspaper, to which the Senator from North Dakota has referred.

Mr. MCCUMBER. That would indicate that the eight-hour or six-hour or any other hour day would have little effect if the mills are to be closed down.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, in connection with the remarks of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] I wish to state that I have observed a tendency on the part of the lumber association of the country, which I believe is national in character, to acquiesce in and even desire complete regulation by the National Government, extending not only over the question of the hours of labor but also extending over the price of the commodity in which they deal. I received a call the other day from a lumber operator on a very large scale in the Northwest and recently in the South, a gentleman of education and capacity and of considerable fortune, acquired by energy and enterprise, who told me that he had read without apprehension a certain interview with myself which appeared in the New York Times some two or three weeks ago, the title of which—a title not suggested by myself, but adopted by the newspaper—was "War-bred socialism," of which I shall, with the leave of the Senate, insert a copy in the RECORD. In this interview I commented upon the fact that the extraordinary prices now being charged by the great industries for commodities upon which an extraordinary demand had been precipitated would force regulation, both State and National; that the law of competition based on supply and demand, upon which we had relied for the regulation of prices, had practically broken down in its ability to meet the public requirements in this great emergency; that the result was that regulation of these great industries was likely to be very largely increased during the years of the war; that the question would be forced upon the attention of both National and State legislatures, and that the effect might be so permanent upon the institutions of the country as practically to substitute regulation for competition as the regulator of prices.

This gentleman stated that he was in favor of having the prices of lumber throughout the United States fixed, just as the prices of coal under a recent law are being fixed. As a man interested in this industry, he felt that it would be very much safer for him and his industry to rely upon public regulation for a fair profit rather than to rely upon competitive conditions, which at times result in great profit and at other times result in great loss and the disturbance of the relations between capital and labor; that more equitable conditions were likely to be secured both for capital and for labor by the extension of the principle which we were applying to our coal mines and to the other great basic industries of the country. I was greatly surprised to receive that expression from a man of wealth and of very great enterprise, a man who in the long range of years has been able through competitive processes to secure very considerable wealth as the result of his good judgment, foresight, and energy. It shows the tendency of the times.

Here we have this lumbermen's association now calling upon the Senator from Washington for the adoption of a nation-wide law regulating the hours of labor, upon the assumption that interstate commerce, under the Constitution, is under the control of the National Government and that we have just as much right to fix the hours of labor in great lumbering enterprises engaged in interstate trade as we have to fix the hours of labor in enterprises engaged in interstate transportation. This tendency deserves the careful consideration and deliberate judgment of Congress.

I wish to add that when we were considering the food-control bill I brought to the attention of the Senate the importance of including lumber, steel, iron, copper, and aluminum in the provisions of that bill. That proposal received only 22 votes. I feel sure that a larger number would have voted for it had it not been for the current feeling that the debate upon the bill had been lengthy and that any attempt to extend the area of its operation would result in further prolongation of the debate and delay in the determination of the important matters covered by that bill; but that question will come up, I imagine, before we adjourn, for a bill is now pending, introduced by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], extending the control now exercised over coal to iron, steel, copper, and aluminum. I am not sure whether it includes lumber, but, in my judgment, it ought to include lumber. It is my purpose at an early day to call together the Interstate Commerce Committee for hearings and action upon this important measure.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NEWLANDS. In a moment. I invite the serious consideration of Congress to the question as to whether it has not the constitutional power to adjust this question of the hours of labor, certainly so far as interstate commerce is concerned. Such regulation, if entered upon, will, of course, have the effect of producing similar results with reference to State commerce, for the same enterprises are engaged in both interstate and State commerce, and if the National Government imposes certain conditions of labor regarding interstate commerce those conditions will necessarily prevail with reference to State commerce also. I now yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I should like to have an expression from him as to what he thinks the effect will be of the law we have enacted relative to the regulation and control of food, coal, and the other articles named in the so-called food-control bill? It is quite evident that the usual conditions of competition in trade have been broken down, and that a new era has arrived in the history of our Government relative to the rules and laws of trade. I am wondering, after listening to the Senator's very able expression this morning, whether he feels that this tendency is toward governmental control of the public utilities of the country or whether it is toward governmental ownership. I should like to hear from the Senator on that question.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think the tendency is toward enlarged governmental control, and, in my opinion, that will probably check the tendency toward Government ownership.

Mr. BRADY. Does the Senator believe that we can enact laws that will enable us to accomplish the purposes which we desire to accomplish in connection with the public utilities by way of control? Does he not believe that the tendency is growing more and more every day toward governmental ownership of public utilities? Let us presume for the moment that the laws we have enacted and which are now in force relative to the control of certain utilities should prove entirely successful. What then? I read in the paper a few mornings ago that the control by the Government of coal would save $30,000,000 in one year to the city of Chicago and the State of Illinois. If by means of such governmental control $30,000,000 can be saved to one State on one article, may it not justify us in continuing that control in time of peace; and if we be justified in doing so, should we not at this time be giving serious consideration and attention to this matter?

The Senator from Nevada in his comprehensive river-control bill spent years of work and labor before accomplishing the result he desired. While I have always been very much in earnest in my support of the principle of affording opportunity to the individual who desires to make the effort, yet I believe the conditions not only in the United States but in the world have been so changed by this war that we are facing a new condition, and that before we get through it is going to be necessary for us to establish some comprehensive system, either of complete control or Government ownership, of the great utilities, something along the very lines of the law we have enacted relative to river control which bears the name of the Senator from Nevada. I should like to have an expression this morning from the Senator from Nevada as to what he thinks about this subject.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state, Mr. President, that I have been drifting in my views for some time. I started as a thoroughgoing individualist.

I yielded to the necessity of public regulation. I should deplore Government ownership of anything, and yet I may drift toward that. I do not think the exigency has arisen yet. I do not think we have sufficiently tried out public regulation of railroads to say that the regulation of railroads is not satisfactory. On the contrary, I think we have accomplished great results. I think possibly it may be necessary to enlarge the area of public utilities in interstate commerce by declaring some things to be affected with a public use that hitherto have not been affected with a public use, but I should move along very cautiously in that direction. We have moved along in that direction with reference to coal and with reference to wheat, but we have limited the duration of that legislation to the war; but it may be so successful that, perhaps in some modified form, it may find a permanent place on the statute books. I am unable to predict as to that. I simply wish to call attention to the tendency of the times and to the fact that almost all of us have been wrenched from our old moorings by the extraordinary exigencies of this war and that our reasoning has been driven into unaccustomed channels.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. I dislike very much to interrupt the Senator, but I am extremely interested in what he is saying. I do not know what effect the regulation in the so-called food-control bill will have upon the coal industry, but I want to say to the Senator from Nevada that I know that it has had a ruinous effect upon the grain industry. I wish the Senator could see the thousands of telegrams which are pouring into this Capitol now from people all over the grain States stating that the markets have been completely ruined.

The food bill, as the Senator knows, was passed with the idea in view that it should stimulate production. I voted as the Senator did on the propositions to include other articles, manufactured articles, as well as grain and coal; but I want to say now to the Senator that already it has had the effect which I said it would have upon the agricultural industry, and, instead of stimulating production, the people of the United States will find that it already has had a most disastrous effect, and that it will be the means of limiting production instead of stimulating it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I do not think sufficient time has been given to test that law, and I have more optimism regarding its results than the Senator from North Dakota. I will simply suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that conditions with reference to every economic change are largely psychological, and that, inasmuch as this is the law, it becomes every good citizen to help its enforcement and not to be too discouraging with reference to the results to be accomplished by it. We can ourselves, if we choose, through the avenues of public communications leading from this body, create a sentiment which may seriously impair the beneficial operation of that law. I appeal to the Senator from North Dakota and other Senators whose judgment led them to oppose that legislation to cooperate with us all now in creating a sentiment that will be favorable to its success, and instead of predicting disaster from it let us all indulge in hope; and if there is any psychological depression in any section of the country arising from the passage of that law, let us do what we can, by encouraging optimism, to remove and relieve it.

The article referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Times, July 29, 1917.]

WAR-BRED SOCIALISM—WHETHER IT WILL BE CHECKED IN AMERICA DEPENDS ON ATTITUDE OF BIG INDUSTRY, SAYS SENATOR NEWLANDS.

If the coal operators who recently agreed upon and suggested to the Government $3 a ton as a fair price for their output had made it $2 or $2.50, the march of the United States toward the goal of socialism would not have been so far along as it now is, according to Senator FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS, who, as chairman of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, has spent years in listening to and studying the pros and cons of all the arguments incidental to the Government control of transportation and to the problems of the other great industries.

Furthermore, the Senator declared in the course of this interview at his home in Washington the other evening, it depends upon the war-time behavior of the great producers themselves whether this country finds itself at the end of the war upon a permanent basis of collectivism or State socialism. In this connection he heartily commends the lumber producers for what they have done already and speaks a good word for the copper and aluminum interests, but he does not think that the coal and steel and iron industries have yet shown the full measure of patriotism and unselfishness which the country has the right to expect of them.

And as to the Sherman law against combinations in restraint of trade, which the Government itself has set aside in the emergency of war, Senator NEWLANDS is confident that if control of combinations proves to be a better thing for the public than penalizing them, such combinations, so controlled and regulated, will continue as a permanent factor in industry after the declaration of peace.

"Our war conditions," said Senator NEWLANDS, "now require supreme collective effort, and that, carried out to the full extent, means socialism. We have found that in war the law of supply and demand breaks down because extraordinary demands are precipitated upon moderate supply. Prices soar, and that means disturbances and readjustments for every kind of labor and industry and for commerce.

"We could not wait long enough, upon entering the war, for the usual effect of increased demand, namely, increased production, to restore the price levels. Therefore, in the stress of war it becomes necessary to take over plants or control prices, unless the desired results of reasonable prices can be obtained by understanding with the producers. When I say reasonable prices I mean reasonable prices not only for the Government but for the public. It is not to be imagined that a country can successfully prosecute a war, even though it obtains its supplies at reasonable prices, if its industrial forces at home are upset by strikes and lockouts. Increasing prices invariably mean a ferment of labor troubles which, in turn, materially impair the military strength of a nation at the front. The laborer is bound to compare the amount which a dollar of his wages will buy to-day with what it would buy a month or a year ago. He has to do this; he is compelled to contend all the time for the maintenance of the power of his wages. If things go up in price, his wages must go up, too.

"We must avoid such a race between prices and wages by keeping prices down not only for the sake of conserving all our present industrial strength for war purposes but for the sake of the economic welfare of the United States after the war in its international trade relations. If we do not avoid such a race between prices and wages, both will increase steadily till the end of the war, when our wage level will be above that of the other belligerent countries in which there has been better control, and the country with the highest wage level will then be at a disadvantage. Its cost of production of all commodities will be above that of the other countries, which will put it out of the running in any competition in its own markets and in the markets of the world. And the high wage level will also bring an influx of labor which the country will not be able to handle.

"Every consideration, therefore, demands that a proper price level shall be maintained by Government regulation, and this, of course, involves a form of State socialism.

"Thus far the administration has sought by mobilizing its industries and by inviting their chiefs to become members of the great coordinating committees in connection with the National Council of Defense and the advisory commission to conscript by a friendly process these interests in the service of the Republic. This method has succeeded so far as some of the products are concerned. For example, it is perfectly clear that the principles of competitive bidding would not have been applicable to the construction of the 16 great army cantonments, each of them intended to be a city of 40,000 soldiers. The risk in a market of rising prices for construction material would have been too great for the contracting builders to name reasonable terms for their work. But the mobilized lumber interests rose to the emergency patriotically, took a survey of the whole lumber situation of the country, and then voluntarily named the reasonable price of from $20 to $23 a thousand feet, a figure, very slightly above normal. The result is that the work on the cantonments base gone on with marvelous rapidity and certainty.

"The coal and iron interests have not responded so patriotically. The prewar price of coal at the mines was from $1.10 to $1.40 a ton. Since then miners' wages have been somewhat increased, enough perhaps to add 25 cents to the cost of production. The cost of materials used in the mines has increased somewhat and higher coal prices were to be expected, naturally. But the extraordinary demand on normal supply, accompanied by car shortage which impeded distribution and deliveries, forced the price of a part of the coal supply, uncontracted for, up to $5 and $6 a ton at the mines. The factories became alarmed and bid acutely against each other. Then the coal operators met at the suggestion of the National Council of Defense and they seemed to think that they were doing a patriotic thing in naming $3 as a fair price at the mouth of the mine.

"If they had been wise, if their notion of patriotism had coincided more closely with public opinion, they would have named a price nearer $2 than $3. Such a price would have made ample allowance for increased cost and extraordinary conditions and afforded a liberal profit. The price is not satisfactory to the War and Navy Departments and to the public and it probably will be necessary to commandeer the mines or their output, or, through both National and State agencies, to fix the price of coal in both interstate and State commerce, thus placing the mines in the group of publicly regulated industries along with the railroads, the telephone and telegraph and the gas and electric light and power companies. In any event the country has been forced a step nearer to socialism by the action of the coal men and we are bound to come out of the war with a great many more industries publicly regulated than we had in the beginning.

"The matter of commandeering opens up a new question. Before the war, if you had asked me whether the Government had power to commandeer properties and plants for public as well as for Government use, I should have said no. But now, in war time, the strength of the Nation's military forces at the front depends so much on the virility and welfare of all the people at home that I am inclined to believe that the courts would uphold the Government in commandeering a public necessity as a legitimate war measure if it were necessary for the proper care of the people.

"But that is a digression. Now as to steel—but first let me say that apparently the copper and aluminum interests have dealt fairly with the Government by giving it prices much below the market of the day. But the iron and steel industries have not thus far shown any such disposition of helpfulness. On the contrary, the indications are that they are demanding, or will demand, more than double the prewar prices. If so, the Government will have to deal summarily with them, not only in its own interest but for the benefit of the public.

"It depends upon the leaders of these industries as well as upon the coal men and all other big producers of necessities whether this country will be permanently socialized after the war. It remains for them to fix, as they may and can, reasonable and just prices and thus do away with the necessity of applying collective force. If there is any statesmanship in these industries able to control the producers, they will see the wisdom of maintaining a fair and stable price level, notwithstanding the temptation of the hour and the times offered by the present plight of humanity. If they yield to this temptation, if they attempt to charge 'all the traffic will bear,' either the Government will take them all over or they will have labor rushing in to share with them the spoils and they will have a lofty wage level which it will be difficult to reduce when the price level falls as a matter of course at the end of the war. It is a reasonable prediction that no industry which is taken over by the Government will ever go back to private ownership.

"An interesting question more or less relevant to all this is what is to become of the Sherman law. That law is based on competition and on the theory that increased prices resulting from increased demands will be followed by increased production, which in turn lowers the prices, and that thus in the long run an equilibrium is maintained. This law is enforced largely by provisions which penalize agreements between producers tending to stabilize or increase prices. When extraordinary demands are imposed on existing supplies, as at present, the Government, with a view to mobilizing its transportation facilities and its commodities, thus increasing both efficiency and volume, has been compelled to deal with each industry collectively and to urge it to combine for such higher efficiency and greater output. This necessarily involves understandings and agreements between railroads and producers which might be regarded as violations of the Sherman law in normal times.

"For example, the coal operators met at the invitation of the Government and discussed prices, a thing they hardly would have dared to do before the war. And as to the railroads, the Government, by law, has authorized the appointment of an executive committee by all the roads for the purpose of coordinating their energies. This thing would have been open to suspicion, to say the least, before the war. So you see the tendency of war conditions is to substitute for penalization of combinations a control and regulation of combinations. If this proves successful and results to public advantage, it will be continued after the war. And collectivism in Government will encourage a regulated collectivism in industry."

Mr. NELSON and Mr. BRADY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, for every poison there is said to be some antidote. Last fall I was at Grand Forks, N. Dak., and the governor of that State made a speech on the platform. Among other things, he said:

We have organized the State of North Dakota under the Nonpartisan League. We have secured control of the State. We shall labor to get the adjoining States—Iowa, Wisconsin, and Minnesota—under the Nonpartisan League, and when we succeed in doing that we will have all speculation and trading on chambers of commerce and grain exchanges stopped.

They have now succeeded in accomplishing that. All trading on the grain exchanges has stopped, and still those classes of men do not seem to be satisfied.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, referring to the remarks made by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] and replied to by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], I am in hearty sympathy with the expressions of the Senator from Nevada relative to giving full opportunity to test the laws we have already enacted. In other words, let us give the country a chance, not for a few days but for a few months, to demonstrate whether or not these laws we have enacted are successful in their operation.

I have received, as every other Senator from agricultural States doubtless has received, a great many telegrams relative to the food-control bill, and especially relative to the price to be paid by the Government for wheat.

There was a general misunderstanding throughout the country—caused, I think, by some dispatches that were sent out before the law was entirely understood—as to just what we did mean by fixing a minimum price of $2 a bushel on wheat.

The general understanding throughout the country has been that the President was given power to fix the price; that if he felt that the time had arrived when we ought to have the price of wheat fixed at $2 a bushel or more he would have the authority under the law to do so. But since then it has been explained that we gave the farmers of this country a positive guaranty of $2 a bushel for their 1918 wheat crop at the primary market. After that was made known throughout the country I received a great many telegrams from my State—I just received some yesterday—saying that they had understood that Mr. Hoover and his board had decided that the price of $2 a bushel for wheat should be in Chicago. I immediately wired back that it was a mistake; that $2 a bushel was the price to be paid at the primary market. Now, I am quite sure that that will be entirely satisfactory to the farmers of my State for the 1918 crop.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BRADY. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I am sure the Senator does not want to confuse this question. The Senator is now speaking of 1918. Of course, we know here that there is no guaranty of anything to the farmer for 1917, or for this year's crop; and I wanted to have him amplify that point.

Mr. BRADY. I agree with the Senator fully. I was just coming to that very point.

That is what we are to do for 1918. Then there was a general impression throughout the country that for the 1917 crop we were going to pay not to exceed $1 a bushel. That has been published in the papers in my State. A definite price has not yet been fixed, but my judgment is that it will be a minimum of not less than $2 a bushel at the primary market. If that be true, the farmers are going to be satisfied.

All that the farmers of this country want is a fair and equitable price, leaving them a reasonable profit. If that be true, and the farmers of North Dakota had a price fixed of $2 a bushel or more to-day for their wheat, there would be a fixed market, and they would be satisfied.

The reason why I refer to this matter is that I want to call the attention of the Senate and the country to the fact that we must take time to get these laws properly in operation. We must acquaint ourselves with the conditions and adjust ourselves to the new conditions that have arisen, so that we will know just what we can depend upon.

I believe that the food-control bill which we enacted, fixing a minimum price, will be carried out in a satisfactory manner, and I am becoming convinced more and more every day that the food control and the fuel control—and I hope oil control—are going to prove successful and beneficial to the masses of the people of this Nation. If they do prove successful, the question that is going to be uppermost in the minds of the people of this Nation—and we might as well prepare to meet the condition—is whether we shall continue this control, or whether we shall have Government ownership of public utilities.

This matter has been agitated not only by the labor unions of this country but by the farmers of this country, and it is a mistake to insinuate, as was done by my good friend the senior Senator from Minnesota, for whom I have the highest regard, that the organization of farmers in North Dakota has not proved successful. It is just exactly like our enacting these laws; it has not had time to be tried out. The farmers of North Dakota are not attempting to make great fortunes out of wheat. They are not attempting to make great fortunes out of any crop. They are simply trying to protect their interests and get the product that they raise on the farm delivered to the consumer without these billions and billions of profits that are made in the different industries of the country every year being distributed to men who do not perform the labor. That is their intention, and they are going to make a success of it before they finish. It may not be successful at the moment; it has not had time to be tried out, but those farmers are in earnest. They are starting on the right line. They are getting their grain elevators and their different cold-storage buildings erected, and they are going in the future to receive benefit from that organization, and if it proves successful it is going to be a stepping-stone to such an organization throughout all these United States.

I did not rise this morning to discuss this matter at length, but I do want to say while I am on my feet that I read an article in the Washington Post day before yesterday that more thoroughly expresses the existing conditions than anything that I have read since this war was declared. I commend that editorial to the Senator, for I want to say now that if governmental control is successful we will never go back to the old conditions in this country. The question to be decided will be whether it shall be governmental control or governmental ownership.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BRADY. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wanted to make an inquiry of the Senator. If I understand correctly the food millennium has not yet arrived. Is that correct?

Mr. BRADY. I believe not, from what I heard from East St. Louis the other day.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was not a food riot, as I understood. It was not about bread.

Mr. BRADY. No; but it is a question of whether or not the millennium has arrived. It seems it has not yet arrived.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am trying to investigate it, and so far no time has been appropriated by the Senate to that question. I am not sensitive about it. If you want to divert the discussion to East St. Louis, I will take it up with you this afternoon or with the Senate, and I challenge the Senate to do so. I wanted to inquire if the pure-food millennium has arrived, in spite of this law.

Mr. BRADY. It has not arrived, but it is arriving very fast.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is?

Mr. BRADY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand that all the grain exchanges have quit, that all the bad men have ceased their manipulations, and no longer annoy, but that the price of food has not fallen, either in Washington or elsewhere.

Mr. BRADY. The Senator from Illinois does not expect the conditions to change in a moment. It has taken over half a century to close these exchanges.

Mr. SHERMAN. All this generation will be dead in half a century.

Mr. BRADY. I say, it has in the past taken that long.

Mr. SHERMAN. But I have a very long list of communications from both consumers and producers, and I want to inquire from the Senator what relief he will give to the flouring mills in the Mississippi Valley that are unable to know how to transact business. Practically, the market is closed in the wheat-producing area for the winter wheat country in the northern Mississippi Valley. There is no market. They can not buy. The farmers can not sell. The elevators are not taking wheat.

I have another communication, not from a monopolist but from a man running a little modest country elevator, just like a farmers' elevator. Several farmers are interested in it. They have bought in the ordinary course of trade what to them is a considerable quantity of wheat at current market prices, offered at the quotation. They bought from farmers bringing in a load to-day or two loads to-morrow. They filled up their elevator. To-day they are bankrupt, because they can not borrow money on their warehouse certificates or on their quantity of grain stored, they can not buy any more grain, and they can not sell what they have.

That is one specific instance. I can multiply it by one thousand. I am asking the Senator if the Senate or the administration has any remedy to offer for this delectable condition of affairs, this arrival of the food millennium that was to follow close upon the heels of this statute?

Mr. BRADY. I might say in passing that I am not responsible for the present administration, but that at the same time I am in sympathy with its position on the food-control matter. The question the Senator from Illinois raises is the very question that has been so ably discussed by the Senator from Nevada this morning. We can not do all these things in a moment; it is going to take time; and these are war times. In France, England, Belgium, and in Germany they not only can not buy and sell their wheat, but they can not use any flour without having a card and a permit to use it. These are war times, and that is the reason why it takes some time to get these matters adjusted.

I believe, and I hope that I am right, and I shall be very sorry if I am mistaken—I hope and believe that the food-control committee, headed by Mr. Hoover, will set a price for 1917 wheat at $2 or more per bushel at the primary market. If that is done the whole question will be settled in 48 hours and wheat will be moving from the producer to the consumer and at the same time taking away the great profits that have been made by speculators and middlemen. Now, I have no quarrel with the men who have engaged in speculation; I have no quarrel with the middlemen who have made large fortunes; but what I rose to say was that we have arrived at a time when the conditions are changed. We have arrived at a time when the Government has taken control of a great many of the necessaries of life, and before we get through with this war it will have taken hold and taken charge of a great many of the public utilities of the country.

The point I wish to make is, if the Government continues this policy, and if it is successful for a year or two or three years and will prove that the farmers can get $2 or more a bushel for their wheat on the farm and it can be manufactured and delivered to people who use the flour for prices that they are willing to pay and can afford to pay——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. BRADY. Does not the Senator believe that that condition will be continued by the American people? If it is to be continued by the American people, we ought to be preparing for it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BRADY. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, when we passed the food bill granting authority to the administration to determine what would be a just and reasonable price for food commodities we necessarily anticipated that there would be a time between the passage of the law and the time its powers were put into effect of such uncertainty as would very naturally depress the price. No one could know what the committee which was provided for to fix prices would do in the premises, and therefore the tendency would be to stop all the trade and wait until the public would know something about what the Government proposed to do. That was the first anticipated effect. The committee is now at work to determine what those prices shall be so far as the Government can make or influence those prices.

I feel certain, and in that I agree with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY], if the committee on price fixing does fix a price just and fair to the producer there will be no complaint, and it will encourage the production for the year 1918. I might say, however, and I think I am justified in saying, that I do not agree that for the 1917 crop a price of $2 a bushel at the principal interior markets would be just and fair to every section of the country.

I want to call the attention of the Senator from Idaho and of the Senate to the fact that the principal spring wheat raising State of North Dakota raised but a fourth of a crop in 1916, and that little one-fourth of a crop was sold at the home market for an average of less than $1 per bushel. In 1917, notwithstanding that failure, farmers paid as high as $3 per bushel for seed wheat and increased the acreage to a considerable extent. They were sorely disappointed in not securing the yield that they expected. So in 1917 we are not raising in that State more than one-half of a crop.

Now, the fact of that almost complete failure in 1916, at least so complete that every farmer in the State lost rather than made money, and the half failure of 1917, so that no farmer can make any money in that State during this year, it ought to have its influence from the standpoint of justice and fairness on the price of the 1917 crop. All the farmers of that State are asking is not that you help them out of their difficulty because of their poor crop, but that you will allow them what the law of supply and demand unhindered would give them, and that would give them this year about $3 per bushel. I feel that in Idaho, where you may have irrigation, you can well afford to raise your wheat, even with the high price of labor, at $2 per bushel; where you raise a good crop in Kansas, Nebraska, or elsewhere you may be able to raise it at a profit at $2 per bushel, but $2 per bushel fixed upon the crop which is raised in my State, taking away from the farmers of my State the benefit of the law of supply and demand for this year, would do them a great injustice and they would not receive that to which they would be entitled, the full value of their crop as fixed by the market.

I am saying this lest the statement of the Senator might reach the ears of the committee which is now sitting in the discussion of that question. I am saying this that the committee or whoever reads these remarks in the RECORD may fully comprehend our situation and the assurance which I can give them that a $2 basis for this year's crop would not be just to the farmers of that State, and they ought to have the equivalent of the price that would be fixed by the law of supply and demand just as they are compelled to pay for everything they purchase, a price that is fixed by the law of supply and demand. If the committee in fixing that price will give them that element of justice there will be no complaint and they will respond, notwithstanding the two years of failure, in putting into the ground next year seed that will cover an acreage far in excess of what they have put in this year, and I hope that they will be accorded that justice in a price for this year's crop of not less than $3 per bushel.

Mr. BRADY. I thank the Senator for his very splendid explanation of the situation in North Dakota. It raises a question that is going to come up in the future in handling the grain crop of the country. The law that we passed does not say that the price shall be $2 per bushel, it says it shall be a minimum of $2 a bushel. The committee is working as hard as it can to adjust all these matters equitably. It may be impossible for them to do justice in all cases, even in the case of the State so ably represented by the Senator from North Dakota, but another year we shall have the plans matured, we shall have the system better organized, and then the men in North Dakota will receive a just and fair price for the crops that they produce, and in Idaho the same condition will exist.

It is quite true that we have splendid crops in Idaho this year, and our farmers, I think, have made some money on wheat, but as the Senator from North Dakota has well said, the conditions are different for this particular year in North Dakota, although it is one of the great wheat States in the country, and there may be reasons why a committee should be appointed to specially investigate the conditions of that kind. But what I desire to speak of this morning is not any particular incident.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BRADY. In a moment. I wish to speak of the general condition that now exists. I believe, as I said before, that the conditions will change after the war. We must not think for a moment that the conditions existing now will exist after peace is declared; other conditions will arise; but before that time comes we should be deciding as far as we can what course we are going to pursue and what policy is going to be taken by the Government after the war is closed. This is a serious question and one that deserves the thoughtful consideration of every Member of this body. We are making history every day. What the outcome will be no one knows. But it is certainly true that the Government is receiving powers and assuming responsibilities that are greater than have ever been given by the people of this Nation before. In my opinion the question of governmental control or governmental ownership is this day on trial. Time and experience alone will demonstrate what is for the best interests of the people, and when the demonstration is made and after a practical experience the Nation is then going to decide this great question in a manner that will be permanent. I now yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. I have just received a telegram on this subject, which is as follows:

SCOBEY, MONT., August 24, 1917.

Hon. HENRY L. MYERS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

M. J. Fearer, of Duluth, Minn., crop expert, who is here now, estimates average wheat yield for northeastern Montana at from 5 to 6 bushels per acre. The fixing of price of wheat at less than $2.50 per bushel would be ruinous to farmers here and would be practically confiscation. If prices are fixed at less than above figure there will be a tremendous decrease in acreage in 1918. Average cost of seed for 1917 was $3 per bushel, and everything used by the farmers in production of wheat has advanced from 50 to 200 per cent, including wages, machinery, live stock, horse feed, gasoline, oils, and lumber. Why should Canada receive $2.40 per bushel and we be compelled to feed the allies at a less figure? Farmers and those dependent upon them are indignant and resent the taking of their crop without fair compensation or compelling them to sell for less than value, as fixed by supply and demand.

SCOBEY COMMERCIAL CLUB.

Last fall and spring the farmers of Montana responded nobly to the President's request for an increased acreage of all foodstuffs, and they put in the largest acreage of wheat that had ever been put in in the State. They made extraordinary efforts. But this year was a very dry year in Montana, the driest the State has had in many years. There is the smallest yield of wheat on unirrigated lands the wheat growers of the State have ever had. In some sections of the State the crop is almost a failure. If the farmers of Montana get less than $2.50 a bushel for their wheat this year I believe it will have the effect of causing a very much decreased acreage to be put in wheat in that State next year. I believe the same holds true of the entire country. I know that is the feeling among Montana wheat growers. I am receiving many telegrams from Montana to that effect. I am submitting them to the food administrator and urging upon him action that will encourage and not discourage Montana wheat growers.

Mr. BRADY. What the Senator says is quite true. Conditions of the weather and seasons will have a material effect in the different States; but, of course, we have to consider the country as a whole. For that reason I believe that the food-control law should be given a thorough test before we pass judgment upon it. The question which is going to be decided is whether we are going to drift to governmental control or whether we are going to drift to governmental ownership, and those who believe in governmental control rather than governmental ownership should use their best efforts to see that governmental control under war conditions is made so successful that it will prove satisfactory to the people after the war is closed and peace is declared.

RECESS.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock Monday morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m., Saturday, August 25, 1917) the Senate took a recess until Monday, August 27, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

MONDAY, August 27, 1917.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, August 15, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

IMPORTATION OF PRISON-MADE GOODS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting reports from the consuls at Cairo, Egypt; Bombay and Madras, India; and Trebizond, Turkey, relative to the extent to which prisoners, paupers, or detained persons are utilized in the production or manufacture of commerce of various countries, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

WAR REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses and for other purposes.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Dillingham	Johnson, Cal.	Kenyon
Brandegee	Fernald	Johnson, S. Dak.	La Follette
Chamberlain	Hale	Jones, N. Mex.	Lodge
Culberson	Hollis	Jones, Wash.	McCumber
Curtis	Husting	Kellogg	McNary

Martin	Penrose	Sheppard	Sterling
Nelson	Pittman	Shields	Stone
Overman	Saulsbury	Simmons	Williams

Mr. STONE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. REED] is detained from the Senate on important business. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-five Senators have answered to their names. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. HARDWICK, Mr. JAMES, Mr. ROBINSON, Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. SWANSON, Mr. TOWNSEND, and Mr. VARDAMAN answered to their names when called.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and also the absence of the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] on account of illness in his family. I will let these announcements stand for the day.

Mr. BECKHAM, Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. NEW, Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. HARDING, Mr. BRADY, Mr. KING, Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. GRONNA, Mr. KIRBY, Mr. NORRIS, Mr. BANKHEAD, and Mr. GERRY entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance if it is his opinion that we are going to get a vote on the pending bill this week?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish that I could give the Senator something like a definite answer to his question. He asks a question in which I am very much interested. All that I can say is that I hope we may be able to get a vote this week, and I think we shall get a vote this week unless the discussion upon the especially controverted portions of the bill which relate to income and excess profits taxes takes a longer time than I now anticipate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will state my reason for asking the question. I believe the chairman of the committee ought to try to get unanimous consent to vote on a certain day this week on the bill, and I think that request ought to be made to-day. A further reason why I asked the question is because I believe a great majority of the Senate are in favor of a vote, and that no good will come by delaying it beyond the week; and that a large number of Senators, I understand, would be very willing to enforce, if given an opportunity, the new rule that we have in order to get a vote not later than Saturday.

If one can not be reached before that date, if we let this measure run along and debate it, and debate it perhaps for weeks, then we will miss our opportunity to get a vote now.

Nobody is more in favor of general debate than I am where its purpose is to affect legislation. I have been opposed to cloture; but I realize the situation we are in now, and knowing, as I think I do know, that no good can come from longer delay, because whatever has been agreed upon to do is going to be done, I think when a reasonable opportunity for discussion has been offered we ought to proceed to vote. Unless the Senator who is chairman of the committee sees fit to ask for some agreement I think some one else ought to do it in order that those Senators who I know do not wish to lose the chance of bringing this measure to a determination some day this week may have an opportunity to act.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have for quite a number of days had in mind asking unanimous consent for a time to vote. I have had every reason to believe, however, that it would be impossible to get a unanimous-consent agreement. It would have been impossible during last week, at least, and I did not see proper to make what I thought would be a practically futile attempt. I had anticipated, however, unless we made progress, some time during the early part of the week to see if we could not get a unanimous-consent agreement or if we could apply our newly adopted cloture rule. But, Mr. President, I have no sort of objection, if anyone desires it, to make an effort now to get a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (to Mr. SIMMONS). Go ahead and make it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know whether the situation is changed from what it was last week. I was informed last week that I could not get it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Let me suggest to the Senator that he unquestionably could get a unanimous-consent rule through better than anyone who is not chairman of the committee and especially one who is not a member of the committee. I believe the people are very anxious and Senators are very anxious that a vote upon the bill should be reached and that we get through with it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me say to the Senator there was not a day last week when I would not have asked for it if I had not every reason to believe that it would have been utterly impossible at any time last week to have gotten it. I had intended to-day to investigate the situation and see whether there was any probability of getting it.

But, Mr. President, let us end the matter. I now ask unanimous consent to vote upon the bill and all amendments now pending and amendments hereafter to be proposed—I was going to say at 4 o'clock on Saturday, but I will start with Friday at 4 o'clock. I ask the Secretary to draw it up. I think that is as soon as the bill could properly be disposed of.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I suggest to the Senator to inquire in advance whether anyone objects or not.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to make that inquiry because I would dislike to have the necessity of calling the roll again. Nobody seems to indicate any purpose to object. Therefore I ask the Secretary to prepare the rule, and I shall offer it formally.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suggest to the chairman of the committee that the most important items in the bill have not yet been disposed of. As far as I am concerned I am not willing now to set a time to vote on the bill and all amendments until those important provisions are disposed of.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will ask the Senator whether he will not consent to a later day, to Wednesday of next week.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I am not willing to fix any time until these important amendments are disposed of. Just as soon as they are disposed of and settled I am ready to vote. I am anxious to vote. These important amendments should be taken up, considered without delay, and disposed of by a vote. I would like to vote to-morrow, as far as that is concerned, upon every proposed amendment, but we have had experience in the past of setting a bill with important amendments pending down for a vote, and all of us here know what the result has been. I want to say that, as far as I am concerned, I am not willing to fix a time to vote on the bill and all amendments until the excess-profits proposition is disposed of.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator believe that if we are going to have unlimited debate it may be next October before we get a vote?

Mr. JONES of Washington. We will not waste any time in debate on the excess-profits proposition in the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Then why can we not agree to vote on Wednesday or Thursday of next week?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Simply because when a unanimous-consent agreement is made nobody pays any attention to the proposition. We might vote long before the time set. We ought to do so; I hope we will. There is certainly no intention on the part of anybody to unnecessarily delay the bill or a vote upon this proposition, but I am not disposed to consent to fixing a time until the excess-profits amendment is disposed of.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the Senator consent to fixing a time after which debate shall be limited to 15 minutes?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly. I am ready for us to begin on that basis right now. I care for no time. I do not want to delay the bill. I want to hasten its passage. The Senator's suggestion would bring early action. I would like to see it followed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It seems to me that that would save a good deal of time. I believe we have better discussion under a 10 or 15 minute rule.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to submit some amendments to the bill, and I ask that they be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask the Senator from North Carolina if we can make an agreement that after Friday morning or Thursday morning debate may be limited to 15 minutes?

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well. I make the request that after 3 o'clock on Thursday, by unanimous consent, debate be limited to 15 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina, in view of the objection made, withdraw his request for unanimous consent first asked?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do. I do not want to have the roll called unnecessarily. I now ask unanimous consent that after 3 o'clock on Thursday of this week debate upon the bill be limited to 15 minutes and upon amendments to the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think the chairman of the committee ought not to prefer any request for unanimous consent to limit debate in any way until the income-tax provisions of the bill and the war-profits tax provisions of the bill are acted upon in Committee of the Whole and the committee amendments and such amendments as Senators desire to offer to those portions of the bill are finally disposed of. The request seems to me to be so unreasonable that I shall take the responsibility of saying that there will not be any unanimous-consent agreement to limit debate in any way until those two important provisions of the bill are debated out fully.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I was wondering if the Senate can not get together on a very common-sense ground and fix a time, if Senators desire it, to dispose of these two very important questions. Can there not be a time fixed for that? I think there is a feeling throughout the Senate that we ought to speedily dispose of the bill.

I do not myself think that the debate is changing very many votes on this floor. If the idea of the extremists prevails relating to the excess-profits tax, it is all the more important that it should be speedily disposed of. If the proposition should be adopted that the corporate and business concerns of this country should pay 60 per cent or 80 per cent tax on their excess profits, it is extremely urgent that that matter be determined, so that these great institutions may prepare to meet the cash payments they will be called upon to make next year. So it seems to me it would be a practical thing, in view of the necessity of letting the country know what burdens it is to assume, that we agree upon a time to end the debate and to vote on these moot questions. Then we can speed along and finish up the bill under the ordinary unanimous-consent rule. I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance if I am wrong in suggesting the possibility of such an agreement?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not know but what the Senator suggests would be a very advisable thing to do provided we could get unanimous consent to do it. I withdraw the last unanimous-consent proposition which I made, in view of the statement made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and I will now try another. It is this: That the debate begin upon the war-profits section of the bill not later than Wednesday of this week, and that not later than Friday at 4 o'clock a vote be taken upon that section of the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, does the Senator desire to make that request without accompanying it with any provision relating to the length of time any Senator may discuss the bill? Does the Senator from North Carolina want to ask for such a speedy determination of the matter and then allow any one Senator or two Senators to take up the entire time?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have made the request in the general way in which I have because I assumed that some such suggestion as the Senator from North Dakota now makes would be made, and I wanted to get suggestions from the Senate for the purpose of meeting any objections of that character.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have no objection, provided that the debate be limited so that Senators who wish to speak 10 or 15 minutes may have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, Mr. President, I will add that during the period I have named debate on the general bill be limited to one hour and not more than one speech and upon amendments that the debate be limited to 15 minutes and not more than one speech.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question. It is a very well-known advertising expression, "Eventually; why not now?" Why can not the Senate have the determination and courage to take this question up to-morrow and let us have the debate and then let us vote. There is not anything to be gained by putting it off from day to day.

Mr. SIMMONS. I beg pardon of the Senator, but it was announced Saturday that to-day we should take up the postal provisions of the bill, and Senators have prepared to discuss that matter.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. KENYON. It is important to get that out of the way.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is important to get that out of the way.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator if there is any reason why we could not to-morrow take up the matter relating to the income-tax provision and the war-profits tax provision? If they were out of the way, I think the Senator will realize that the remainder of the bill can be taken care of very speedily. I agree with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] that we should take that matter up and dispose of it as quickly as we can.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should be perfectly willing to take the matter up to-morrow, provided we get through with the consideration of the postal provisions. I do not think we ought to debate them for a day and then return to them a little bit later. I think we had better dispose of them when we take them up.

Mr. HARDING. I suggest to the chairman of the committee that he ask for an agreement to take up the war-profits tax provision and any further discussion of the income-tax provision not later than 4 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will make the request that immediately upon the final action of the Senate upon the title relating to the postal rates we take up the excess-profits tax provision.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Allow me to suggest to the Senator——

Mr. NORRIS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will not the vote of many Senators upon the postal section of the bill depend very largely upon what determination is reached as to the income-tax and the war-profits tax provisions? If we are going to raise ample revenue without the proposed increases on postal rates, will not the votes of many Senators be determined by that? Therefore, should not the income tax and the excess-profits tax be first determined?

Mr. SIMMONS. That might be so.

Mr. NORRIS. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska will state his point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. I make the point of order on the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina that we have already, by unanimous consent, agreed that no amendments shall be offered to the bill by individual Senators until committee amendments shall have been disposed of. They have not yet been disposed of, and hence agreement to the Senator's request would be a violation of that unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not understand that there was any unanimous-consent agreement about that. It was an order of the Senate such as is always made when we begin the consideration of revenue and appropriation bills.

Mr. NORRIS. But it was agreed by unanimous consent that the committee amendments should first be taken up for consideration.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator from North Carolina will yield for a suggestion, I desire to say that what the Senator from Nebraska refers to was a mere understanding with reference to procedure, although it has the force and effect of a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. NORRIS. It does not make any difference what it was; it was a unanimous-consent agreement, reiterated after it had once been violated and the Senator from Idaho had called particular attention to its violation, and said, "Now we understand the matter, it is not going to be again violated." It was so understood at that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is compelled to overrule the point of order made by the Senator from Nebraska, not thinking that the request of the Senator from North Carolina would be a violation of a unanimous-consent agreement. The matter is within the control of the Senate, and the practice has been distinctly otherwise in all cases.

Mr. NORRIS. The Chair then holds that we can set aside one unanimous-consent agreement by another?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the unanimous consent asked for by the Senator from North Carolina is perfectly proper, even though the Senate agreed first to consider committee amendments, and the Senate has frequently done that.

Mr. HOLLIS. The Senate could not do otherwise. We take up a bill by unanimous consent, then we lay it aside by unanimous consent from time to time. The Senate is doing that continually. It can not be a violation of the unanimous consent referred to by the Senator from Nebraska to seek to do something else by unanimous consent.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no disposition to appeal from the decision of the Chair. I do not care to pursue the matter now as the Chair has decided it.

Mr. HOLLIS. I made the ruling when in the Chair, and I am somewhat sensitive about having it overruled now.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not care to pursue the matter, but the Senator is arguing a question after it has been disposed of. I would just as lief have it that way as well as any other; in fact, I am inclined to think the Chair is right, but the fact that we take up a bill by unanimous consent and then lay it aside has nothing to do with the question. We made the agreement by unanimous consent that committee amendments should first be disposed of. Now the consent the Senator from North Carolina asks for may not violate that agreement, and it may; at least, it will preclude any Senator from offering amendments unless we have it understood that the other unanimous-consent agreement is set aside.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that as soon as the postal title of the bill is disposed of, and not later than Wednesday morning, the Senate proceed to the consideration of the excess war-profits tax title of the bill, and that it vote upon that not later than 4 o'clock on Friday, the debate to be limited to 1 hour on the bill and 15 minutes on amendments, and that no Senator be allowed to speak more than once on either the bill or upon any amendment thereto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I stated a few moments ago that I should object to any request for unanimous consent to limit debate in any way until the war-profits tax provisions of this bill and the income-tax provisions of this bill are disposed of.

Now, I want to say while I am on my feet one word further about it. I think we should dispose of the income-tax provisions of the bill before we take up the war-profits tax provisions. They come first in order, and I think that the amount which the Senate finally settles upon with regard to income taxes will be a sort of basis in the minds of Senators for the adoption of a proper and relative war-profits tax. I believe in my own mind that there ought to be some ratio or relation between the income tax and the war-profits tax, and I think they should be disposed of in the order in which they are written in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to the request.

Mr. SIMMONS. I withdraw the request, Mr. President.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the chairman of the committee that he try to secure an agreement to vote on the postal provisions at some time to-morrow.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have been trying to do that, but I have not been able to do it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. But the Senator coupled it with other matters.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have segregated it and tried to arrange it, but I find I can not do so.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to suggest, however, that the Senator has not made a specific request for the disposition of the postal provisions.

Mr. SIMMONS. I knew that if the request was made it would be objected to. I have had information to that effect.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I did not know that. It seems to me we ought to dispose of that matter some time to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina if he does not think there is a great deal of wisdom in the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] that we take up the war-profits provisions of the bill before we take up the question of postal revenues?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have agreed with Senators that we would take up the postal provisions to-day, and I prefer to pursue that course this morning, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not see anyone who appears to be very keen about discussing that matter this morning.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] is now waiting to address the Senate upon that question.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me just for a moment, I am perfectly willing for the Senator to adopt whatever plan of procedure he prefers. I am ready, if he wants to proceed with the postal provisions of the bill, to go ahead now.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say that I desire to have the Senate consider the postal rates this morning.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That settles it, of course.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish now to give notice that immediately upon the conclusion by the Senate of the consideration of the title to which I have so many times referred, namely, the title relating to postal rates, I shall ask to take up the war-profits title of the bill, and when that is taken up I shall insist upon the Senate continuously considering it until the section is finally disposed of.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I present an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered. What is the pleasure of the Senate with regard to the present bill?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico and Mr. HUSTING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I suggest that the committee amendments be read for adoption under Title XI of the bill, "Postal rates and war tax on profits of publications."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read. The Chair hears no objection.

The SECRETARY. On page 94——

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendments. There has been so much confusion because of stopping the Secretary that the Chair thinks he had better proceed.

The SECRETARY. On page 94, line 3, it is proposed to change the number of the title from "XII" to "XI," and in the same line, after the word "rates," to insert "and war tax on profits of publications," so as to make the subhead read:

Title XI.—Postal rates and war tax on profits of publications.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 94, line 5, to change the number of the section from "1200" to "1100," and on the same line, after the word "That," to insert "on and after 30 days after the enactment of this act," so as to read:

SEC. 1100. That on and after 30 days after the enactment of this act the rate of postage on all mail matter of the first class.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 94, line 7, after the word "cards," to insert "and private mailing or post cards."

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, agreement to that amendment, as well as to the one immediately following it, would involve the determination of a matter about which the Senate ought to be advised before the committee amendment is agreed to. When the committee amendments are agreed to, in the interest of economy of time and for the purpose of simplifying the procedure, I shall ask the consent of the Senate to submit a motion immediately in this connection to strike out the section, because, whether the amendments are agreed to or whether the amendments are not agreed to, the real test on this section comes on the motion to strike it out.

The House bill, Mr. President, carries with it certain increases on first-class postal rates. The Senate committee amendment carries those substantial increases in substantially the same amount, with the certain modifications that are now before the Senate; so that, independent of whether the text of the House bill is agreed to or whether the text of the Senate committee amendment is substituted, after all, the real question, the main question, is, Shall we grant these increases in first-class mail rates? And that question can only be raised by a motion to strike out the section, whether amended as proposed by the committee or not.

I do not care to discuss that general question now, because in a short while it will be before the Senate, if my request is granted; but I do think it is my duty to call the attention of the Senate, and particularly the attention of members of the committee, to the situation that is involved in and is developed by this committee amendment.

The House of Representatives proposed to increase letter postage from 2 to 3 cents per ounce, and at the same time proposed to increase the postage on post cards and postal cards—and they have a different significance—from 1 cent to 2 cents. The Senate committee agrees to the proposal of the House to make the rate on letter postage 3 cents instead of 2 cents as now fixed by law, but proposes to amend that portion of the proposal of the House which raises the rate on post cards and postals from 1 cent to 2 cents.

The committee estimates, Mr. President—and the Post Office Department, with the exception I am about to make now, is not inclined to take issue with that estimate—that something like $50,000,000 of revenue would be raised by this action; but the committee has overlooked entirely, so far as its hearings show, it has overlooked entirely, so for as its report shows, what possible effect might be had upon the postal revenues from first-class mail matter by fixing letter postage at 3 cents and leaving the rate on postal cards at 1 cent. If letters are to cost 3 cents apiece to be mailed, instead of 2 cents, as at present, and post cards and postals are to remain at 1 cent, what volume of letter mail will be diverted into post cards and postals, and what will be the effect of such diversion upon the revenues of the Government, and will the net result be a $50,000,000 increase in revenue as the committee figures, or will it be nothing, as the Post Office Department is inclined to fear?

On that subject, Mr. President, I desire to read to the Senate a letter addressed to me on the 21st day of August, 1917, by the Acting Postmaster General. This letter proceeds:

MY DEAR SENATOR HARDWICK: Referring to section 1100 of the war-revenue bill, H. R. 4280, as recently reported to the Senate, which provides for an increase of 1 cent for each ounce or fraction thereof in the rate of postage on all mail matter of the first class, except postal cards and private mailing or post cards, I deem it proper to call your attention to the effect this provision would have if enacted into law.

Should the present rate of 1 cent each for postal cards and for private mailing or post cards remain unchanged and the postage on letters be increased as proposed—

That is, to 3 cents—

Many persons who now send their communications as letters at the 2-cent rate now prevailing would undoubtedly use postal cards or private mailing or post cards for that purpose rather than pay the additional charge of 1 cent an ounce which this bill imposes upon letters. Consequently the amount of revenue which would be derived from the additional postage charge on first-class mail matter would fall below that which might otherwise be anticipated, and at the same time there would be a decrease in the regular postal receipts from the first-class mail matter because of the use of postal cards and private-mailing cards in lieu of letters if there should be so great a difference as 2 cents between the postal or private mailing or post card and a letter. On the other hand, if the postage on postal cards and private mailing or post cards should be increased to 2 cents, there would be a tendency on the part of those now using letters to continue their use even though the rate should be increased, since there would then be no greater difference between the postage on a postal card or private mailing or post card and a letter than there is at present.

Yours, very truly,

J. C. KOONS,
Acting Postmaster General.

The Post Office Department officials tell me that they are utterly unable to estimate what the effect of this will be on the revenues, and that they hesitate to venture a guess; that they are unwilling even to hazard an opinion. They say their opinion has not been requested on this subject by anybody except by me; that the Committee on Finance made this change without the slightest investigation, as far as they know, and certainly without the slightest effort to obtain from them their opinion or any of the facts related to this matter.

I submit, Mr. President, to the thoughtful common sense of the Senate, that it is a pretty dangerous proposition to undertake to deal with the postal rates in this sort of a way. When we fix the postage on letters at 3 cents and leave the postage on postal cards at 1 cent, I think each one of us will realize, as a matter of common sense, that many men who now write letters that do not contain anything that is particularly confidential or especially private will at once write postal cards at 1 cent a piece, instead of letters at 3 cents.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, there is so much conversation on the floor that it is difficult to follow the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The Senator from Wisconsin makes the point of order that the Senate is not in order. The point of order is sustained. Senators will please resume their seats and cease conversation.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BRADY. I should like to ask the Senator if under the existing law there is any limit to the size of a postal card? Must it be the usual three and a half by six, or could it be six by twelve, for example?

Mr. HARDWICK. I suppose there are some limits fixed by the postal regulations. What they are I can not tell the Senator; but that has no possible relation to the point immediately in controversy. That is a piece of information that might be of some practical use to the Senator, but I have not got it at hand, because, of course, it is not related to this question.

Now, Senators, I do not know what the effect on the postal revenues derived from first-class mail matter will be if you do this thing. The Post Office Department does not know—not an officer in it, from the Postmaster General to any one of its employees or experts who for years has worked on this matter—and I submit that it is dangerous in the extreme, it is hazardous to a degree, for the Senate to undertake to run a risk like this without the slightest investigation on the part of its committee as to what the possible effect of what this sort of a thing might be.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me ask the Senator if he knows where this proposition originated?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is it possible that the Senate is seriously considering this question?

Mr. HARDWICK. It seems so. The Finance Committee have reported it favorably to the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If we have come to the point where we must follow the plan which the Senator has just referred to, I seriously mistake the intelligence and common sense of the Senate.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think the Senator is right about that; I hope so, at least.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not believe it has any special standing in this body; and it seems to me that it is a waste of time for us to discuss a matter of that kind coming unofficially and informally to the Senate, as it comes here.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. As I understood the Senator from Michigan to ask where this proposition came from, I will say to him that the House provided an increase in the rate on first-class mail matter under existing law from 2 to 3 cents on letters, and increased the rate on postal cards from 1 cent to 2 cents, and increased the rate on drop letters from 1 cent to 2 cents. The Committee on Finance, or the majority of them, thought that the postal cards and drop letters should remain as they are at 1 cent, and that the rate on letters should be increased, as the House provided, from 2 cents to 3 cents.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But, Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia will pardon me——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The House sent a number of propositions over here, and in an hour here a week ago we increased our revenues by $75,000,000 in directions that seemed wise and appropriate. Surely we have not come to the point where we propose to inconvenience and change the established customs of the country, well recognized by our citizens, in order to add an indefinite and an unsatisfactory and an uncertain sum to our revenues.

I do not want to delay the Senator further——

Mr. HARDWICK. That is all right.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But it does seem to me as though the Senate could not approve any such proposition as this.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, this but illustrates the danger of the Senate undertaking, under the advice of one of its standing committees that has no jurisdiction of the subject matter, general legislation in regulation of another department of the Government concerning which it has no particular knowledge and concerning which it has not made very careful inquiry.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It seems to me that the Senator must admit the propriety of the Finance Committee of the Senate taking up this question and trying to do something with it. The House, in its bill, made very material changes in the postal rates, and that bill came over to the Senate for action. It was referred to the Committee on Finance of the Senate. Therefore it seems to me that the Committee on Finance of the Senate could only take up the question and deal with it as it thought best.

Mr. HARDWICK. I thought the Senator wanted to ask me a question. If he wants to make an argument in reply to mine, he can do so later.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator, for a question.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Well, then, the question I should like to ask the Senator is whether or not he thinks it was improper for the Finance Committee of the Senate to undertake to deal with this matter, the provision having been put into the bill by the action of the House?

Mr. HARDWICK. I will ask the Senator from Nebraska to pardon me until I answer the Senator from New Mexico.

If the Finance Committee of the Senate are going to undertake to deal with this matter, they had better try to find out what the facts are before they do. I say that without intending any personal reflection on any member of the committee; but as a matter of plain, cold, naked justice, if they were going to undertake to change the plan of the House, they ought to have found out what effect it was anticipated such a change might have on the revenues of the Government in regard to the great subject matter with which they were undertaking to deal before they came to the Senate, giving this proposition the stamp of committee approval and favor, and asked them to do something as to which not one of them can even give an estimate at this minute, as to what the effect will be on the revenues of the Government. That is what I think.

Because the House of Representatives and its committee dealt with a subject matter in a certain way, therefore and for that reason it was not at all incumbent on either the Senate or its committee to make the same mistake, if one was made; and certainly if they were going to undertake to change the proposal of the House committee and the proposal of the House of Representatives in an important and an essential particular, they ought at least to have found out from the Post Office Department what it was expected the effect of such a change might be upon the postal revenues of the Government. Certainly if they have not done those things—and they can not claim that they have—they ought not to expect their proposition to have very much standing before a Senate that wants to do justice to the Government and to the department, as well as to the people of the United States.

I now yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Georgia whether the Committee on Ways and Means of the House took up this matter with the Post Office Department before they put this provision in the bill, and whether the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads in the House had been consulted or made any investigation in regard to it?

Mr. HARDWICK. They had, in both cases; and the department, I think, advised about each step of the House proposal, although opposing it. The department's position was that the proposition of the House of Representatives was somewhat better than existing law in relation to some of these things; not as to the increase in the rate on first-class mail matter, however.

Mr. NORRIS. I am asking, Mr. President, particularly with reference to this particular section, and that deals with the increase only.

Mr. HARDWICK. With reference to this particular section, which deals with the increases in the rates on first-class mail matter, the department have always been opposed to any change. The department have always contended, uniformly and consistently, that when they were getting somewhere from eighty to ninety million dollars a year profit out of this class of mail matter, and were losing a similar amount in dead loss on another class of mail matter, there was little excuse and no justification for increasing these rates at all. The committee of the House of Representatives, however, did at least consult the Post Office Department about this relative change in mail rates on letters and on postal cards, and they did fix their proposition so that it was not anticipated that the department and the Government might lose a great deal of money on account of a diversion of mail from letters to post cards. But for some reason that I have yet to hear explained our committee, without the slightest consultation with anybody so far as I am advised, without the slightest information from anybody, so far as I am advised and so far as the Post Office Department is advised, undertook to change this, to leave postal cards at 1 cent and to put letters at 3 cents. I repeat that I do not believe, with all personal deference to the members of that committee, some of whom are among my warmest friends in this body, that any one of them ever even inquired into the question.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia if he, as a member of the Post Office Committee, does not recall some of the testimony before that committee as to the effect of a reduction of the 3-cent postal rate to 2 cents and the increase thereafter in the use of the mails?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes. Of course the matter of which the Senator from South Dakota speaks was before the Post Office Committee of the Senate. Undoubtedly it is true—the history of every country on earth, every civilized country that maintains a postal service, proves it without exception—that whenever you decrease the mail rates you increase the volume of mail; and equally undoubtedly the reverse of that proposition is true, that if you increase the rates the natural and logical and inevitable effect is that you will decrease the volume of mail. So that even the Senate committee, in estimating what revenue might be derived from this increase in postal rates, instead of claiming that the increase would be $62,000,000—which it would have been according to the figures, if the volume of business remained stationary—allowed themselves $12,000,000 for that and put the amount at $50,000,000 that they expected to get in additional revenues from this increase.

I think the Post Office Department is justified in saying, in contending, and in urging that the Senate of the United States ought not to take this kind of hasty action; that the Senate of the United States ought not to take these thoughtless liberties with the postal revenues without information or even inquiry about the probable effect of the changes they propose upon those revenues.

I think the Post Office Department is justified in contending and urging that before legislation of this character is submitted to this body with any hope that it might pass or any thought that it might receive serious consideration, there ought to be a careful and accurate investigation of what the outcome of changes of this sort will be and of what the final result of it will be, as far as can be told by an investigation.

So, Mr. President, I think the original position of the Postmaster General with reference to this matter is abundantly sustained by reason and is abundantly justified upon principles of common sense.

I find that on May 23, 1917, soon after this bill reached the Senate and was referred to this committee, the Postmaster General addressed to Chairman SIMMONS this communication:

> MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Referring to that provision in the pending measure to provide revenue to defray war expenses and for other purposes relating to the rates of postage on mail matter of the second class, I have to inform you that I am still of the opinion that the Postal Service should not be used as a means for raising war revenue.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, what is the date of that letter?

Mr. HARDWICK. May 23, 1917.

The Post Office Department contends, and contends correctly, I believe, that this bill was no place for any of this matter; but the Post Office Department contends, and contends correctly, I know, that if this bill is to be made the vehicle for determining questions of this sort, these matters ought to be disposed of correctly, after full information as to exactly what each one of them means.

Mr. President, I want to say to the Senate that, regardless of whether the Senate follows the committee or not and leaps in the dark on this matter of the relative increase of letter postage and of postal-card postage, the section still, when it is perfected by the Senate, whether it is the one way or the other way, ought, in my judgment, to be stricken from the bill. We not only ought to disagree to the proposal of our own committee, but we also ought to enter our emphatic dissent from the action of the House of Representatives in respect to this matter; and that, of course, is my major premise in this matter.

Now, why do I say so? First-class mail matter, including not only letters but post cards and postals and drop letters, produced during the year 1916, in round figures, $184,000,000.

Of this amount, post cards and postals—the difference in the departmental definition of these words is that postals are the cards the Government furnishes and the post cards are the cards manufactured by private business enterprise—$16,000,000 for postals and post cards. Drop letters and local mail of all kinds, $46,000,000. So, deducting these two items, $16,000,000 and $46,000,000, $62,000,000 in all, from the $184,000,000, which was the total of expense from first-class mail matter, we are left with a balance of $124,000,000 on receipts of all other first-class mail matter, except the items specified and mentioned. If the rate on these be increased—and that is a part of it to which the increase would apply—from 2 cents per ounce or fraction thereof, as now provided by law, to 3 cents per ounce, as proposed both by the House of Representatives and the Senate committee, the result ought to be half of $124,000,000, provided the volume of business remains stationary under the increase in receipts, which it will not do. That increase, therefore, figured mathematically would amount to $62,000,000 per year, provided as many letters were mailed under the increase as were mailed before it.

Of course, no one could anticipate that result in the light of all postal history everywhere. So the Senate committee figured instead of $62,000,000, which was the exact mathematical result, an increase of $50,000,000, allowing for decrease in the volume of business. To that conclusion the Post Office Department takes no issue, I am informed.

Now, while we make on first-class matter—out of it as a net result from its handling—a figure that is variously estimated at from sixty to eighty million dollars, and which the Post Office Department itself undertakes to fix at $60,000,000, we are losing on second-class mail matter, and all Senators know what that is without any further description, an equivalent sum.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator means, I take it, $60,000,000 under the present rate?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir; $60,000,000 profit per annum is their estimate under the present rate. We are losing on second-class matter an even greater sum; at least $72,000,000.

In support of the amendment offered by myself in relation to second-class mail matter, the officials of the department who have studied this question gave some evidence before the Senate Committee on Finance. Among others who gave such evidence was Mr. Joseph Stewart, special assistant to the Attorney General, assigned to the Postmaster General for the purpose of assisting in matters affecting the postal revenue, a gentleman who has been Second Assistant Postmaster General of the United States for many years, and who has an accurate and expert knowledge of all this question. On page 639 of part 2 of the hearings Mr. Stewart made this statement:

The revenue per pound for first-class matter ascertained at that time—

That is, at the time of the Hughes commission—and revised up to the date of the submission of the data to the Hughes commission was 83 cents and the expense of transporting and handling 56 cents per pound, leaving a profit of 27 cents per pound. It is believed that the unit revenue and cost with respect to this class of mail matter have not changed materially, and it is therefore concluded, based upon the revenue received for 1916, that the profit to the department in transporting and handling this matter was approximately $60,000,000 for the fiscal year.

Let me say in this connection that the First Assistant Postmaster General is himself an expert in matters of this sort and figured the amount ten or fifteen million dollars larger. This estimate of Mr. Stewart is the most conservative figure and is the lowest figure anybody has ever fixed who has studied this question.

Mr. POMERENE. I wish to understand the Senator correctly. Do I understand from his statement that the First Assistant Postmaster General figures the profits at ten or eleven million dollars more than——

Mr. HARDWICK. From first-class mail.

Mr. POMERENE. That is Mr. Stewart?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir; Mr. Koons told me only this morning he believed it was in excess of $70,000,000, and he said if Mr. Stewart had so figured it it would have been a conservative figure, but he was not disposed to find fault with him on that matter. Anyhow it is undisputable and undeniably true that from second-class mail matter we realize sixty to seventy million dollars a year under the present rate without the 3-cent postage that is now proposed.

I am not going into the details of the other side of this question yet, because I must do it at great length in a short while, but I say how unreasonable, how unjust to the great masses of the people of this country who must pay the postage bill to undertake to raise $3,000,000—and really that is what it amounts to, exactly $2,845,887.50—upon second-class mail matter on which we are losing, according to the opinion of the same expert, $72,000,000 a year, and according to the opinion of almost everybody else at least $80,000,000 a year. I say how unjust, how unreasonable, how unfair when we come to raise war profits upon the postal revenues of the Government to take that branch of the service that is losing from $70,000,000 to $80,000,000 a year and assess only $3,000,000 of increase to it, less than $3,000,000, and then turn to that other branch of the service that is sustaining the whole structure, that is running the whole business, and from which we are receiving a profit of from sixty to seventy million dollars under existing rates, and add $50,000,000 more to it. It will not do to justify it by saying that you add 50 per cent increase in one case and 50 per cent increase in the other, because you perpetuate injustice and inequality when you do it, because you accentuate the wrong and injustice when you undertake to perpetuate and increase them both in the same way.

Why? It is admitted that second-class rates are grossly unfair, very low, until it amounts to a bounty that already must smell to high heaven, out of the pockets of the American people, to certain favored publishers in this country. Yet, when you come to touch that bounty you dare not say to these men, "You shall pay to the Government of the United States not a paltry tax, in consideration of being allowed the bounty which you now get, but you shall pay to the Government of the United States not what this service costs the Government, not what everybody else on the earth except a government managed by and run in the interests of politics and politicians would impose, but you must pay a 5 per cent business tax on it? How severe this is to these men.

Ah, gentlemen, I am opposed to that. We ought not to levy any special business taxes on these people that every other business man in America does not have to pay. They ought to be treated just exactly like other business men and not differently. We ought not to put a paltry $5,000,000 on them and a little $3,000,000 increase and say in consideration of this $8,000,000 you can keep the sixty or seventy million dollars you are already getting as a bounty from it.

The plain people of this Republic, Mr. President, and all the people of this Republic as well, who mail the letters, who pay the postage bills, who pay the stamps, are already contributing their full, their just, nay, their generous share to the expenses of the Government, whether in war or in peace; and I say I am utterly opposed, forever opposed, to any proposition which increases their burden as wholly unnecessary and as absolutely unjust and as relatively unjust as well until you make these other branches of the Postal Service self-sustaining, to say the least of it.

Mr. President, I do not want to take too much of the time of the Senate; I do not want to weary Senators or exhaust their patience in this matter, but it is a proposition which appeals to my sense of justice and to my sense of injustice as well. At a later period when we arrive at the consideration of the next section of the bill I hope to go at length and with some particularity of statement and some strength of corroborative statement into the questions affecting second-class mail matter; but I say for the present on this section that it is not only my opinion as a Senator of the United States but it is the opinion of the Post Office Department, which administers this law that must deal with matters of this sort, that it is utterly and entirely unnecessary even under the excuse of a necessity for war revenue.

Mr. DILLINGHAM and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

Mr. HARDWICK. Just one moment; let me finish the sentence. To increase in any way the postage on letters or post cards, there is no justification whatever for it. I yield to the Senator from Vermont. I think he rose first.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I notice that the Senator expressed an individual opinion and further an opinion of the Post Office Department that it is economically a bad proposition to increase the rate of postage on letters.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Without increasing it upon postal cards.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; that was not the Senator's opinion, and as to that the department was afraid of what might happen. But the department is opposed to an increase at all in second-class mail matter and so is the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I suppose that opinion is based upon statistics of some kind growing out of the experience of our country and of other nations of the world perhaps in increasing and decreasing the rates of postage on first-class matter. What I wanted to inquire of the Senator was this: Have any estimates been prepared that would show the probable effect of such an enactment as this upon the volume of first-class matter passing through the mail?

Mr. HARDWICK. Was the Senator from Vermont in the Chamber when I referred to that matter a few moments ago?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I was, but I did not catch the Senator's statement.

Mr. HARDWICK. There was no such statement as that. I have tried my best to get it from the department, but they have not prepared such a statement. They were not requested to do it by the Finance Committee. I began with them a few days ago to get that matter, and I will say that I have not been able to get it yet. They just feel in a general way that there is the greatest sort of doubt and uncertainty about it.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I was listening to the Senator, but I was not able to understand just what he said.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will recall, I read the statement the Acting Postmaster General, Mr. Koons, made as to what the effect of it would be, and he is unable to go further than that. I will tell you why, because that was stated to me orally. As far as the Post Office Department officials know there has been no such disparity between the rates on postal cards and letters anyway, and there are therefore no figures that can be gotten anywhere, and it is a mere matter of opinion and guessing about which it is difficult to obtain either statistics or figures.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I understand they are very positive in their convictions.

Mr. HARDWICK. They are very much afraid it will have a very grave effect in reducing the revenue derived from letter postage. Now I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to say to the Senator from Georgia the committee report that $50,000,000 will be derived from this extra 1 cent they place on first-class postage. Has the Senator any information which will corroborate that statement? Will that much be produced, and how much will be lost by reason of the increase in postage? If the Senator has any information on that subject, I should like to have it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think I gave that. Perhaps the Senator did not hear it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not hear it. I was not in the Chamber at the time.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Post Office Department informed the Senate committee that $50,000,000 revenue would be raised from this increase on first-class matter. That is probably accurate, with the exception of the fact that it does not take into consideration at all the disparity between letter postage and postal postage, and they do not know how many million dollars that might or might not affect, and they are unable to give anything except an opinion on it, because a hasty examination does not disclose a similar situation anywhere else. It does not seem that other countries have been willing to risk any such disparity as that, and our own has never done it, and nobody knows what the effect will be. It is merely a matter of opinion. The department, however, is firmly convinced there are many dangers, and they hesitate very much to be forced to do anything like that, and I do not believe the Senate will put them in that sort of a position. It seems to me that before our committee took action they ought to have found out and ought to have stopped to find out—they had the bill long enough—and they ought to have had the department find out exactly what the effect of it might be on the postal revenues.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I ask the Senator if he can suggest any avenue of information which would lead to certain results or estimates upon the subject?

Mr. BRADY. In answering the question I should like very much to have the Senator from Georgia expound his view as to whether or not he thinks the committee should have brought in an amendment of this character without having the information that the Senator from New Mexico suggests might be obtained?

Mr. HARDWICK. I should think if you could not get it at all you had better not do it, and if you could not get it I certainly would not want to take such chances.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks the committee should have desisted from trying to raise a revenue from any source where it was impossible to obtain accurate estimates, through statistics or otherwise, as to the amount of revenue which might be raised?

Mr. HARDWICK. The committee made no effort at all in this matter. It did not even ask the Postmaster General or the post-office authorities, as I understand it, to try to get this information for them.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator, I understand, admits that any inquiry along the lines suggested by him would have been futile.

Mr. HARDWICK. For that reason the committee ought never to have undertaken it, and I will tell you why it would have been futile. The disparity is so great, as no other Government has tried it, that ought to warn sensible Senators that we had better not make the effort; certainly not without careful investigations and consideration, to say the least of it.

We can not get the figures, of course, because there are no such figures anywhere. We are not willing to risk such a thing as that. We believe, as a matter of common sense, that if the postage is 1 cent on a card and 3 cents on a letter you will cut your revenue all to pieces, and it looks to me like a matter of common sense. I do not regard the committee amendment, except from the standpoint of tearing the Government's revenue to pieces to some extent—I do not know how much—as of major importance. The main proposition with me is that, whether you will accept the committee amendment and leave this disparity between letter postage and postal-card postage or not, you still ought not to raise $50,000,000 a year, or any other considerable sum, out of the people who are already paying into the Treasury a profit of from $60,000,000 to $70,000,000 a year until you recoup the loss from other people who are causing the Government to lose from $60,000,000 to $70,000,000 on another branch of the same service. To illustrate, Mr. President——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I understand that the committee amendment proposes to raise about $60,000,000 additional on the increased rate on letter mail?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. VARDAMAN. And that letter mail already yields a profit of about $70,000,000 a year?

Mr. HARDWICK. It yields a profit of from $60,000,000 to $70,000,000 a year.

Mr. VARDAMAN. While on second-class mail matter——

Mr. HARDWICK. The Government loses from $72,000,000 to $80,000,000 a year; and we propose to raise only $3,000,000 a year more on that.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to ask if any Senator has given any excuse or reason for that disparity?

Mr. HARDWICK. I will give the Senator a reason for it. It is because of the lively interest of public men in these publications; it is because of the lively fear of public men of these publications; it is because public men hesitate to offend the newspapers and magazines of this country and are willing to let the Government Treasury lose money rather than to run the risk themselves of political opposition from these papers and magazines.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator will pardon me, I can understand how it might be prudent to prevent the crippling of any meritorious publication; but there are means by which this revenue could be raised without increasing the rates on letter mail, which places the burden upon the people who are really least able to bear it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I quite agree with the Senator, and that is why I am going to move to strike out this section as soon as we dispose of the committee amendments.

Mr. President, if I have expressed myself strongly in this matter it is because I feel deeply, and it is because I think I understand it. I am not in the attitude, I hope—certainly I do not want to be so understood—of criticizing any Member of the Senate who takes a contrary view or who adopts a contrary course. I believe that in most cases it is done ignorantly, where it is done at all; but I can not help but think—because I know the temptation in my own case—that every Senator, or every Member of the other House, for that matter, when he comes to deal with this question can not help but feel that it would make his own path a little easier and his own personal and political success a little more certain if he would favor the newspapers and magazines, so that in turn they would favor him. But, Mr. President, the day is coming, if, indeed, it is not already here, when the great masses of the business people everywhere in the Republic who do not own newspapers in which we may be praised or abused, but who possess common, ordinary business sense and who do feel that such things ought to be arranged fairly and squarely and without special privileges to anybody on this earth, will begin to assert themselves. As illustratng how they feel, and how the people throughout this country will feel when you ask them to put on a letter a 3-cent stamp, instead of a 2-cent stamp as they now do, when they remember that you are literally giving to the newspapers and magazines of this country from $70,000,000 to $80,000,000 a year out of the Treasury, while you are asking them to do that—as illustrating how they feel, I want to read to the Senate now a letter which I received on May 29, 1917, just four days after this bill came to the Senate from the House of Representatives, from a great organization of business men in this country, which was formed to advocate national 1-cent postage on letters.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. Before the Senator from Georgia proceeds to read the letter will it disconcert him if I should ask him a question in view of his last statement?

Mr. HARDWICK. No.

Mr. KING. A great many newspaper men and magazine men have assured me in the past week that there is no justification for the statement that the Government is compelled to sustain a loss of from $70,000,000 to $80,000,000 per annum by reason of taking care of second-class mail matter. I ask the Senator from Georgia if there can be any question as to the truthfulness and accuracy of the statement that the Senator has made as to the loss occasioned to the Government on second-class mail matter?

Mr. HARDWICK. There is not the slightest doubt on earth about it; and I can prove it by the report of every commission which has ever investigated the question and by the opinion and position of every Postmaster General, whether he was a Republican or Democrat, who ever presided over that department. When we come to that section of the bill I hope to be able to demonstrate that to the Senate as thoroughly as I would a proposition in mathematics; and I have the material right here which has been furnished by the Post Office Department which I think will do it.

Mr. President, on the 29th of May, four days after this bill came to the Senate, the president of this great business men's association to which I have referred—an association established, organized, and maintained to promote the cause of 1-cent postage in this country, because it is a fact that no informed man can dispute that letter postage at 1 cent would more than pay the cost of that branch of the Post Office Department and of that character of mail—wrote a letter addressed to me, in which he says:

MY DEAR SENATOR: We understand that periodical publishers are greatly exercised over the proposed advance in their postage rate. They state that the cost of paper has greatly advanced and hence that they should be unmolested.

Let me interpolate here that before this debate ends I think I can establish that the plea of the publishers that they ought not to be molested or have their rates increased now on account of the increase in the cost of print paper is wholly specious and entirely misleading; that in every case they have passed that cost on to the public, either through their subscribers or through their advertisers—usually the latter—and I will prove it in case after case with reference to publications—daily, weekly, and monthly.

This letter continues:

This argument shows—

That is the argument of the publishers in regard to print paper—

This argument shows specious selfishness and lack of patriotism. What citizen's income has not been hard hit by increased cost of everything in the past two years? The fewer than 30,000 periodical publishers surely can not believe themselves the only ones who are sufferers. Millions of their fellow citizens are in the same box. Many of these publishers are even now, in spite of high cost of paper, endeavoring to enlarge their subscription lists in order to secure more advertising revenue by going just as near to giving publications away as they dare to. Some of the most clamorous are reducing rates for subscriptions for a term of years to less than cost of white paper, this in direct contravention of law. We explain this situation in our leaflet No. 15 inclosed.

This letter continues:

A plain statement of conditions, so simple that many deductions are practically axiomatic, follows:

(a) The annual expense account of the Post Office last year was over $300,000,000. One-eighth of the mail was first class, and it paid about $190,000,000 of revenue for service costing less than $100,000,000.

(b) Second class was five times as much in amount, namely, over 1,202,000,000 pounds—over 60 per cent of the total. It paid less than $11,500,000—

Against $190,000,000 in the other case—for its service, which cost more than $95,000,000.

Letter mail costs four-times as much only per pound as second-class, but pays eighty times as much, as letters are light in weight and average over 40 to the pound.

Letter mail produces a surplus of between $80,000,000 and $90,000,000.

I am reading these figures as they appear; some of them are a little high, I think.

Periodical mail causes a loss of between $80,000,000 and $90,000,000.

Nearly all periodicals descant eloquently, fervently, frequently against special privilege, yet continue to accept this special privilege of distribution of their output (including advertising, which is their merchandise) at 1 cent per pound, though knowing that the cost is many times higher—in fact, over 8 cents per pound.

They declaim against a zone system, the only essentially just method of basing payment.

Let me interpolate there that I do not agree with these people about that, although anything is better than the present system—

Obviously, cost of distribution of daily papers carrying much news and a moderate amount of advertising over short hauls of 15 to 100 miles is far less per pound than the copy distribution accorded hundreds of millions of copies of national magazines after a thousand miles of haul.

One might think that these patriots (sic?) would tumble over each other to be first in asking that they be permitted to pay at least cost of service before any advance be made in letter postage, which is already excessively overtaxed.

I invite the special attention of the Senate to the next paragraph in this letter, because it states this case in a very overwhelming way—

Letter mail has contributed during the last 10 years $1,400,000,000 of revenue, of which quite $650,000,000 has been net profit, in order to permit Government to give for less than $80,000,000 to fewer than 30,000 periodical publishers a service which has cost over $700,000,000 for the entire time.

This association continues:

If it be desirable to be as easy on them as a decent regard for justice to the rest of the community will permit, at least advance second class by a zone system, but do it in three steps, becoming operative four months apart.

Make no advance on drop letters, three-fourths of the stamp on which is already net profit, and an advance on which will stampede millions of them into hand delivery and reduce revenue.

Make the advance on other letters operative only after at least the first advance on second class has become operative.

We are sure every statement we have made will be confirmed by Gen. Burleson and his assistants.

Hoping you will give this matter the consideration it is entitled to, we remain—

The letter is signed by Charles William Burrows, president of the National One Cent Letter Postage Association, Cleveland, Ohio.

Mr. President, unless some Senator wants me to answer questions in connection with this matter, I do not want to go more into details on this second-class mail matter until we reach it and I offer the amendment which I have proposed, which will be slightly modified at the suggestion of the Post Office Department. When we get to that I expect to be able to demonstrate with an accuracy which is usually confined to mathematics the statement made just now that the annual loss to the Government from handling this class of business is fully $72,000,000 a year and, I think, in excess of that figure.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator state, Mr. President, the character of publiciations that receive this subsidy?

Mr. HARDWICK. I am going to make proffer of some of them. Here is the Dry Goods Economist, that goes out as educational matter, for instance. If there is any reading matter except advertising in it I should like to discover it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator state what particular dry goods concern issues that paper?

Mr. HARDWICK. Some New York concern.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator know whether trade advertising publications of a concern like Sears, Roebuck & Co. are sent at reduced rates as second-class matter?

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, undoubtedly. All advertising publications, although they are purely commercial schemes and business enterprises, are handled by the Government of the United States at a cost eight times as great as the Government derives from the payment of the postage.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, May I ask the Senator if he thinks it practicable to draft an amendment so as to exempt certain publications altruistic in their nature?

Mr. HARDWICK. Such as religious magazines?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Such as religious magazines and publications of that character which are really designed for the uplift and benefit of humanity, and to close the mails to publications of a purely business and commercial character such as those to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, undoubtedly; the Post Office Department has done that.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to have the Senator suggest the amendment he has in mind.

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course the only trouble about my going into that now is that I will have to go over it again when we come to the next section. I will, however, undertake to state it in a purely preliminary way. The Post Office Department believes that the original basis on which this privilege was granted, which was the necessity to diffuse education and intelligence among the people under a democratic form of government, is a wise one. It does not propose to interfere with it; it has no wish to interfere with it, nor have I. I am perfectly willing, and so is the department, that the rates should remain at the present ridiculously low figure of one-eighth of the cost of the service for all matter that is reading matter, that is educational matter, that is editorial matter, although I do not think some of the editorials amount to much along educational lines.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Reading matter, whether educational or not?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; all reading matter, no matter how harmful and vicious and unprincipled some of it is. Now, I am willing that that should go at the present rate, which is one-eighth of the amount that it costs us to render the service; but when it comes to the business end of these enterprises, to their commercial side, to the money-making end, then I say that they ought to stand on their own bottom and pay the Government of the United States what it costs us to render them the service that we do render them; that anything less than that is graft, pure and simple and unadulterated, and that if we permit it, knowing it to be such, we will not be easily relieved ourselves from the burden that will follow such a course.

How can you separate the two? It is easy enough. You can do it with a foot rule. You can take an issue of any paper and measure it, column after column and page after page, and when you have measured it all you can see how many inches are devoted to reading matter and how many inches are devoted to advertising matter. In that way you can fix the percentage of advertising matter, which is the commercial end of the project, that each newspaper, whether it is a daily or a weekly or a monthly, carries in its columns, and when you average that through a sufficient period of time in order to give stability and balance to your computation you have a fair settlement of that question.

I not only say that you can do it, but I say that advisedly, because it has been done already by the Post Office Department. Before that part of the subject is left I shall be able to show, if you will give me the name of almost any paper, whether it is a daily paper or whether it is a great weekly or monthly magazine, exactly what per cent of advertising matter is carried in its columns on an average.

Now, then, bearing that in mind, this is the amendment that I offer:

That the rates of postage on publications entered as second-class matter, including sample copies to the extent of 10 per cent of the weight of copies mailed to subscribers during the calendar year, when sent by the publisher thereof from the office of publication, or when sent by a news agent to actual subscribers thereto, or to other news agents for the purpose of sale, until June 30, 1918, shall be 1 cent a pound or fraction thereof for the portion of the publication devoted to reading matter other than advertising, and 2 cents a pound or fraction thereof for the portion devoted to advertising——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. I notice that the Senator from Georgia, in giving the rates, said "2 cents a pound or fraction thereof."

Mr. HARDWICK. Two cents a pound is what I should have said with regard to advertising. Did I read it wrongly?

Mr. POMERENE. No; but I have before me the hearings before the Finance Committee, and they give a rate of 3 cents or fraction thereof.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is the change we have made recently. The Post Office Department and myself, in consultation, instead of keeping the three steps at 3, 6, and 8 cents on advertising, decided that it might be better and possibly fairer to put it at 2, 4, 6, and 8.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator is reading the amendment as he proposes to offer it?

Mr. HARDWICK. As I propose to offer it; yes. The Senator, of course, is reading correctly from the hearings, but there has been that change made. Now, the proposal as we finally have drafted it is this:

And 2 cents a pound or fraction thereof for the portion devoted to advertising; and beginning July 1, 1918, and until June 30, 1919, the rate of postage shall be 1 cent a pound or fraction thereof for the portion devoted to reading matter other than advertising, and 4 cents a pound or fraction thereof for the portion devoted to advertising——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What zone is that?

Mr. HARDWICK. There is no zone in this.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator is eliminating the zone system?

Mr. HARDWICK. I never have believed in the zone system, and never have advocated it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Did not the Senator's first amendment as to freights cover a zone system?

Mr. HARDWICK. No, sir. I have always believed that a flat rate was better than the zone system, for reasons which I will state later on. In fact, I will state them now. I do not mind telling my colleague now why I think so.

The trouble about a zone system is this: You know, we once had it in the law. It was the law in the early part of the history of this country for many years; but it was changed for just one reason, and I think it was a good reason. We used to have the zone system, but it was found that it had a tendency to narrow and provincialize the press; it had a tendency to restrict the circulation of all publications—dailies, weeklies, and monthlies—so narrowly that these publications themselves developed an ingrowing spirit; and it was thought that it was wiser and best, considering the vast expanse of this country and its multiform interests and its varying and diverse conditions, that the other system—the same system of flat-rate charges that carries a letter just as cheaply to San Francisco, Cal., as it does to Alexandria, Va., from this point—ought to be applied to that also, in the interests of national unity, and the development of a national spirit in the press.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the Senator think that since the organization of these news agencies, by which the news of the entire country is flashed to every city in the country, that makes a change in so far as the narrowing tendencies he mentions are concerned; and is it not now true that a newspaper in San Francisco can publish the same news that a newspaper in New York can publish and at substantially the same time?

Mr. HARDWICK. It can do it, but it does not always do it.

Mr. McKELLAR. If I am correctly informed, an association like the Associated Press gives to every newspaper that is a subscriber precisely the same news at virtually and substantially the same time.

Mr. HARDWICK. The trouble about the Senator's consideration of this question—and I say this with all kindness and with some concurrence in some of the things the Senator believes in—is that it has not gone beyond the narrow circle of a few daily papers published in cities of from fifty to one hundred thousand population, who would like to get this proposition so adjusted that they would establish a little zone around their own cities that would about cover their territory and keep the present low rates on everything—advertising and everything else—and then let us do what we please with the balance of it.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; if the Senator pleases——

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me finish. I do not yield to the Senator just now. I am going to yield to him in a minute. In other words, they are in this position:

God bless me and my son John,
Me and my wife, him and his wife;
Us four, and no more.

That is what they want. The Southeastern Publishers' Association I now and here publicly characterize as being in that position.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield now?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield now; yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Quite the contrary, Mr. President. I think the Senator will agree with me, and that we all agree, that the present flat-rate system, by which the country is taxed some eighty-odd millions of dollars—about eighty-nine millions, according to the best reports—for the carrying of second-class mail matter, is wrong.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; I think the Senator is right about that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I mean, we all agree to that.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not know whether we all do or not. The Senator and I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, virtually, I think, most people agree that our system ought to be self-sustaining. Now, we have tried out the zone system in connection with the parcel post. That is self-sustaining, and gives the Government in addition a profit of about $10,000,000 a year. Surely, if we have worked it out in regard to the parcel-post system, the same zone system can be worked out so as to make all second-class mail self-sustaining. That is what we ought to do, and it is the only way to do it. If the Senator establishes a flat rate, whether on advertising or in any other way, it is unscientific; it can not be sustained in any way; and whatever method is adopted, in my judgment, will prove a failure, just as the present flat rate has proved a failure.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now I want to finish reading this amendment, Mr. President. This amendment, if it should be adopted by the Senate and enacted into law, will undoubtedly make this business self-sustaining. The Senator need not be concerned about that. There is, of course, this difficulty about the flat-rate system: It is made up on the law of averages. Some people will get their stuff carried, where the haul is long, for a cheaper rate than others, where the haul is short. Nobody can avoid that under this system. The same thing is true about every letter that you mail, and——

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, that is——

Mr. HARDWICK. Pardon me; I do not want to engage in a running debate now about this matter, because I want to finish with it.

Mr. McKELLAR. All right.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator knows that I will yield to him before I get through. Let me finish reading my amendment:

And beginning July 1, 1919, and until June 30, 1920, the rate of postage shall be 1 cent a pound or fraction thereof for the portion devoted to reading matter other than advertising, and 6 cents a pound or fraction thereof for the portion devoted to advertising; and beginning July 1, 1920, and thereafter, the rate of postage for the portion devoted to reading matter other than advertising shall be 1 cent a pound or fraction thereof and 8 cents a pound or fraction thereof for the portion devoted to advertising: Provided, That the rate on copies deposited in a letter-carrier office for delivery by its carriers and the free-in-county circulation and rates on copies mailed within the county of publication shall continue as now provided by law: Provided further, That the Postmaster General may hereafter require publishers to separate or make up in such manner as he may direct all matter of the second class when offered for mailing.

Mr. President, this proposition, according to the estimate of the department, would produce, as against the $3,000,000 increase, which is all that the Senate committee proposes to give us from this defaulting second-class mail matter, the following amounts:

September 1, 1917—well, we can not get it enacted by that time; if we say October, we will have to put it one month farther back, and if the bill becomes a law by that time we will be lucky—June 30, 1919, 1 cent on all for 2 months, $1,897,255; 1 cent on reading matter and 2 cents on advertising matter for 10 months, $13,280,785; a total of a little over $15,000,000—no more, or just about as much, when the fractional part of the year is considered, for the first year as the Senate committee's amendment would raise.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. Just one second, if the Senator pleases. But at the second stage this amendment, if enacted into law, would produce $25,000,000 and a little over; at the third stage, when we get the advertising matter up to 6 cents, a little over $34,000,000; and at the fourth stage, when we get it to what it costs us to handle it, between $43,000,000 and $44,000,000.

I now yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I was called out of the Chamber for a moment, and I did not ascertain whether the Senator's proposed amendment took into consideration these publications that are devoted entirely to fiction—magazines such as Short Stories, and others that will readily occur to the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. They would continue at the present rate, because they contain reading matter. In other words, my amendment does not provide, nor does the Post Office Department urge, any increase in second-class mail rates when applied to reading matter. That is really reading matter.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I think the Post Office Department and the Senator are entirely too generous.

Mr. HARDWICK. That may be.

Mr. KING. It seems to me that those magazines that are devoted to fiction solely—and the Senator will remember that there are a large number of them in the United States, and the benefits to be derived from them are certainly very problematical—ought to have imposed upon them a higher rate. On a good book that is sent through the mail you have to pay 8 cents a pound, as I remember.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. KING. I do not see why these cheap, trashy works of fiction that are published as magazines ought not be called upon to pay a reasonable rate for transportation.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator may be right about that; but in making this reform we have got to begin at the beginning. The principle that we assert and that we seek to establish and that we endeavor to carry into law is this:

On matter that is educational in its character, intended for the benefit of the country, we have not drawn the lines yet as they will be drawn later when we work out the matter in detail. I am merely stating now the general principle. The principle is that educational matter, matter that is intended to educate the public—the education of which is necessary if free institutions are to be perpetuated and maintained in this country—we will allow to go through the mails at the same purely nominal rate that now exists by law; but that when it comes to that part of each one of these enterprises that is dual in its nature and dual in its character, that has a business end—and usually the biggest end is the business end—as well as a reading end and an informing end, on the business end of it they ought to pay to the Government and we ought to require them to pay to the Government what it costs to send their merchandise through the mails.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. HARDING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STERLING. The question of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] suggests another one, and with reference to quite a different class of periodicals and journals. That class is the religious journal or periodical and the farm newspaper or periodical. I should like to know if the Senator has taken into consideration these journals, and whether they are not entitled to some special recognition from the Senate?

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me say to the Senator that the system that they ought to object to most, and that those of them who are well informed do object to most, is the zone system; because you can take any religious publication that is the organ of a church, or that is read by members of a church scattered throughout this country—I have in mind particularly the Christian Science Monitor and the International Sunday School Lessons publication—and they must go throughout the Republic to its farthest limits, because there are some people everywhere that want those Sunday school lessons and that read this Christian Science paper. Now, the worst thing in the world for them is a zone system, because under it they can not reach, except at almost prohibitive cost, their scattered subscribers.

Now, I think that some of the business men connected with these religious papers are just like all the balance of them. They would like to keep the rates just as they are. Whatever advantage they have under the law they would like to maintain. I am not speaking now of the religious editors, but of the business managers of some of the publications. But I have talked in person with the editors of some of the largest publications, and some of the most reputable. I have in mind particularly the gentleman who edits and publishes these great International Sunday School Lessons. Their publications carry hardly any commercial stuff. It is the rarest thing in the world that you see any advertising that amounts to anything in them, so that they are really not concerned in this proposal if my proposition is adopted, because the present rate will remain, as far as their publications are concerned. I am speaking now particularly of the religious publications. But if you put them under a zone system like the House of Representatives proposes or like my friend the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] proposes, you will put them out of business, so they claim.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HARDWICK. Not just yet. I have a letter in that connection from the secretary of the Association of Religious Publishers, dated last Saturday.

I do not agree with the person who writes that letter. In the first place, I think any publication should agree that the advertising matter which they carry in their columns shall pay a sensible compensatory rate to the Government. Surely every sort of publication—business, agricultural, or trade journals—should be willing to do that. As I said before, and I do not think this gentleman can dispute it, most of these religious publications carry very little of this matter. Those of them that do carry any of it ought to be willing to pay the Government what is costs to conduct the business, just as everybody else ought to be willing, and I am willing to make them do it whether they are willing or not.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I just want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that in the House bill, which provides for a zone system, an exception was made specifically in favor of farm journals and religious journals.

Mr. HARDWICK. It ought not to be made.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I think it ought to be made. The Senator said just a moment ago that they virtually carried no advertising matter.

Mr. HARDWICK. A more erroneous position was never taken. I do not believe in exemption from the equality of the law or from the equality of tax burdens for anybody, whether they conduct religious papers or labor papers or what not. The law ought to be fair and uniform.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me finish this statement and then I will yield. It ought to be just. The general rule ought to apply to all alike, no matter what sort of paper they run. The beauty of the proposition is that it does apply to all alike, that if they have 1 inch of advertising matter under this proposition of the Post Office Department they pay only on that inch, and if they have three-fourths advertising matter they pay the rate of that advertising matter—three-fourths. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARDING. I quite agree with the policy just announced by the Senator from Georgia, and I think it very appropriate to interject the observation at this time that there is rarely a farm journal and there is rarely a religious journal that does not have an advantage of the bulk subscription. They are not obtained in the usual way.

Mr. HARDWICK. There is no reason on earth why any exemption should be made in that case. We ought to set up a rate that is fair and just and then we ought to treat the rich and poor alike.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. In view of the discussion with respect to the amount of advertising in religious journals, I find that the Senator himself incorporated in the hearings of the committee a paper, on page 636, and the per cent of advertising runs from 35.9 to 37.5 per cent of the total. The Sunday School Times, to which reference has been made, gives 18.75 per cent of advertising.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator is right; I did present such a table to the Senate committee. My recollection in a general way—I have not examined it for several weeks—is that the table shows that most of the religious journals have a very small per cent of advertising.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator is right. It is relatively small.

Mr. HARDWICK. I mean compared with the other publications. Most of these papers either take or borrow from somebody else and they do not contain a very large percentage of advertising matter. I may be in error, but that is my recollection of it.

Mr. President, I hope that we will be able to vote on the pending question, unless there is some reason why it should be delayed. I believe the Senator from Utah suggested that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] was also opposed to this increase in first-class mail matter and wanted to be heard and can not be here this morning. I suppose there will be some discussion. So I will assume some members of the committee may attempt to defend it, although I hope not. I should like to have a vote on it. I do not believe there is any reason, any justification, any excuse, any fairness, or any necessity for increasing these postal rates on first-class mail matter. The other day when we handled the income tax we added at one stroke millions on top of millions more than is involved in this proposition, and before we get through with the excess-profits tax and income returns I think we will add still more millions. I say that whatever the future may bring to us, it has not yet been demonstrated that we should increase the letter postage from 2 cents to 3 cents, when if justice is to obtain the real proposal would be to cut it to 1 cent, instead of leaving it at 2 cents. I hope the Senate of the United States will not leap in the dark in this matter and put this vexatious and unnecessary tax upon the great masses of the people in the shape of an increased tax on letters and such things, whenever under the present 2-cent rate we are already realizing a net profit per year of more than $60,000,000—surely that is contribution enough, even in war times, from this class of mail.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I simply wish to make a very few observations on the pending question. I am a "country" newspaper publisher by occupation, and I suspect when we come to a vote on this question, out of a proper regard for the proprieties of the occasion, I shall decline to vote. Nevertheless, I think it is becoming to say a word on the question from the publisher's viewpoint.

I very cordially join in approving the policy that publications of this land ought to pay the reasonable cost of their distribution. I have a pretty strong conviction, however, that the question does not belong in the war-revenue bill.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] has given recognition to one important point which I very much wish to commend. Whatever Congress does in the way of revision of second-class postal rates ought to be made effective essentially a year after the enactment. I say that because under regulations the Post Office Department——

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me just a moment, I wish to invite his attention to the fact that, as finally modified by the department, there are four steps to it and it will be three years.

Mr. HARDING. I understand the Senator. I am not in accord with the tax provision of his amendment relating to advertisements; but I started to say that a revision of second-class rates ought to be made effective a year after the enactment, because any publisher who adheres to the regulations of the Post Office Department is obliged to have his subscriptions paid in advance. Therefore it would be only fair if the publications of the land are required to collect a sufficient subscription to pay the postage cost of distribution; they should have notice and make the subscription price adequate to cover that expense.

Mr. President, I am at a loss to understand why Congress is unable to take up the question of second-class postage and solve it aright. I can understand the inadequacy of the second-class rate to meet present-day conditions. There has been an evolution of the newspaper-publication business as there has been in many other lines of American activity. If any of you have picked up a newspaper, for example, of years ago when this policy was first adopted, he will discover that it was really a journal, not a modern newspaper. The newspaper, particularly the American newspaper, is a modern conception. If you will pick up one of the publications of 50, 80, or 100 years ago, notably 100 years ago, there will scarcely be found an advertisement in it. Of course, they had no such method of distributing the news of the world as obtain to-day. They were limited in size, they were distinct in character, marked by the personality or the individuality of the editor. But the modern publication has become very much commercialized, not offensively so, and it is fair to say that 95 per cent of the publications of America to-day—and they are the best, in my judgment, in the world—are founded on advertising. There is not any mistake about that.

There has been some reference made—I am sorry the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] is not present——

Mr. STERLING. Here he is.

Mr. HARDING. Oh, I beg the Senator's pardon. There has been some reference made about farm publications. In my capacity as a newspaper publisher I have been called upon for some years past to pass upon arrangements for combining circulation price, and I state only a truth when I say that many a notable farm journal is furnished to our publication for clubbing offers, our publication acting as the subscription agent, at the merest nominal sum. The highest that I recall is 25 cents a year, though the subscription price may nominally be $1 or $2. The publisher of farm journals, like every other, wants circulation, because on circulation he bases his charge for advertising, which is his main source of income.

The newspaper field in advertising is necessarily restricted. For example, a Washington paper would not appeal effectively to the local advertiser at an advertising price based on circulation in Ohio or Pennsylvania or New Jersey, even though it circulated there quite freely, because that territory is not tributary to the retail interests of this community.

His advertising is based on a circulation that he has in a field tributary to the point of mercantile distribution. So he has little inducement from the advertising viewpoint to reach out into the far-distant States. For the New York retail advertiser, for example, who contributes, I should say, more than 90 per cent of the bulk of advertising in the New York newspapers, there is no attractiveness to circulation in California or Colorado or Kansas. So there would be no advantage in giving the publication a flat rate to reach far-distant points, so far as our newspapers are concerned.

It is quite a different matter, however, when you reach the periodicals. I was very much amused to recall, while the Senator from Georgia was talking, that one of the well-known sayings recently illustrated by a cartoonist is that "in looking over a periodical I delight to note the advertising pages." I am not sure but that there are periodicals to-day whose advertising pages are more attractive than the text. But putting that quite aside, the big problem is to make the publications of this land pay what they owe the Government for distribution.

There are some inequities in the zone proposition. For the smaller newspaper publications the zone proposition would be a fortunate thing. I am not sure but that it would be a rather just policy to provide some sort of a zone rate in their behalf.

As you know, Mr. President, we try to provide conditions in the United States where everybody has his opportunity, and I know from personal experience that by taking advantage of the flat and utterly inadequate second-class postage rate the city publication has made its trespass on the natural field of the smaller publications. I have no sympathy with him in his protest against the increase of rates, because he deliberately takes a subscription price that he charges under carrier distribution in the cities and cuts that rate at the distant point beyond a possible compensating price.

In other words, a newspaper in a great city in Ohio, seeking to reach out 100 or 150 miles for circulation, will take a subscription price in the city of $3 a year and cut it to $2 and, in some instances, to $1.50 in the rural community, doing it because of the cheapness of distribution under the existing Government provision. That is a discrimination, in the first place, to the subscriber, and, in the second place, it is a discrimination which has a tendency to ruin the local competition in the publishing world, which is quite as important to the local community as it is to the great city.

So, then, having these things in mind, recalling that modern publications are of necessity based on advertising, I think Congress ought to go at this scientifically. If we know precisely the deficit which the Government experiences through its carrying of second-class mail, we ought to proceed and levy a cost rate on the publications of this land, and if they believe in the gospel they preach they ought to pay it without complaint.

If any of you were familiar with the business you would understand that the tax proposed by the Senator from Georgia on advertising would ruin much of the publication business of this country. Mr. President, I undertake to say that not to exceed 20 per cent of the revenues of the newspaper come from its subscription department. If it is a successful publication the percentage will be less than that; and out of the advertising receipts, based upon the attractiveness of the paper, is builded the great modern publication.

I can recall very distinctly, and it is not so very many years ago, that the average price of a country weekly paper was $2 per year. Sometimes it was paid with a load of wood, not infrequently with a crock of apple butter, and a good many trades were made between the rural publisher and the community he sought to serve. We had pretty good publications in those days, and they were, by the way, stamped a good deal more by the individuality of the publisher than the modern publication is.

I think it is no unfair reference to the publication world to say that policies often, nowadays, are submitted to the business department, but while we have had an outcry from these same publishers about special privileges and graft and inadequacy of Government business management, the publishers of weekly newspapers have been lowering their price of subscription cost from $2 to $1.50 and then to a dollar, and many a weekly publication in the land to-day is delivered to the subscriber at 50 cents a year. I can remember well when the average sales price of a daily newspaper throughout the land was 5 cents a copy. I believe that, except on Sundays, there is no newspaper to-day save one east of the Rocky Mountains which charges such a retail selling price. On Sundays, of course, it is quite a different proposition. I note that a New York Sunday paper in Washington has reached the retail price of 10 cents, which is not at all surprising because of the very exceptional increase in the cost of the paper used in producing it. I think it fair to keep that matter in mind in passing judgment on the pending amendment.

Mr. President, there are publications in this land in the interior cities which have not the advantages of large purchases of print paper, where they use perhaps from 5 to 20 carloads per year, where the cost of publishing a paper, owing to existing market conditions of the print supply, has been increased far more than the net earning capacity of the plant. I am violating no secret when I say that the publication by which I earn a living, at the increased cost of operation made by the advance in paper is equivalent to more than 80 per cent of our annual earnings. Under these conditions it does not seem to me it is an opportune time to undertake the new regulation. However, if Congress believes that this change of rate belongs in the revenue bill then it ought, by all means, to be made effective some time in 1918, so that the publishers, whether they are newspaper publishers or whether they publish weekly or monthly periodicals, may fix a price of subscription commensurate with the increased cost of distribution.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HARDING. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator stated a short time ago that the proposed amendment of the Senator from Georgia relative to advertising matter would ruin the publication business. I wish the Senator would go into that a little more in detail and explain just how that would take place and why.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, it would ruin a large proportion of the business, because the Senator from Georgia, in his anxiety to bring to the Government an adequate return for distribution, places a flat rate cost per pound in relation to the advertising carried, without regard to the zone of distribution. In other words, a publication in the city of Washington might carry, and probably does carry, an average of 50 per cent of its space in advertising. If you had a zone rate adjusted to the distribution cost and proportioned to the advertising carried and effective in a limited territory it might survive and be a profitable publication, but if you charge a rate, the same, for instance, as the Cosmopolitan Magazine, published in New York, which is distributed throughout the United States and Canada, you have put the burden on the man of the limited field so high that he can not pay it and make a profit. Do I make it clear?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator makes it clear, I think. I think I understand the proposition.

Mr. HARDING. If you are going to put a tax on the proportion of advertising carried, you can not be fair unless you adopt the zone rate.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the point I thought the Senator would have to reach. Now, I should like to ask the Senator if the application of the amendment of the Senator from Georgia would not mean that the carrying of periodicals and newspapers by express companies would increase very greatly? In other words, they would extend the zone of their operations and would carry them wherever the business was profitable to them, and as a matter of fact the Government would get what was left on the unprofitable long distance carried, so that at least to a great extent it would interfere with the income of the Government under the operation of that kind of law.

Mr. HARDING. It is pretty difficult for me to say, in responding to the Senator, just exactly what would happen in the service of the express companies and the return to the Government, but I am frank to say to him that many a publisher now, under existing rates, low as they are, finds it to his advantage to use the express company in what we call bundle delivery. As the Senator knows, there are some perfectly ridiculous regulations in the Post Office Department to-day. I venture to suggest one. Under what is known as the free county service, rendered for the local paper originally, a very desirable conception to encourage the building and distribution of the local newspaper—I do not know whether there is any law for it or not—but a regulation of the department will enable me, as a publisher, to take 100 pounds of newspapers, either addressed to the agent or labeled to the individual subscriber, and send them the longest railway haul in my county, which happens to be 17 miles, perfectly free of any charge; and yet if I put the 100 pounds of papers in the Marion post office, which is my town, for distribution on a local rural route—and in that case I put the Government to no extra expense whatever, while of course it must pay the railway transportation for the 17 miles in the first instance mentioned—I am charged the second-class postage rate.

Mr. NORRIS. That goes out of the county, I take it.

Mr. HARDING. Not at all. It charges me for the rural route which starts out from the city of publication.

Mr. NORRIS. Within the county?

Mr. HARDING. Within the county. It charges the second-class postage rate there, whereas if I send the same hundred pounds of paper 17 miles by rail, within the county, to a non-free delivery municipality, it is perfectly free.

Mr. NORRIS. That certainly is a condition that is very unfair, it seems to me.

Mr. HARDWICK. It was admitted in the hearings that it was done in an effort to relieve the rural routes.

Mr. HARDING. No; the Senator is wrong, because these papers that go 17 miles are sent to the rural routes for distribution. I think I can tell the Senator how it happened. The ruling originated in what you call free city delivery offices, with the idea of charging the daily newspaper a flat rate, a pound rate, if it chose to use the city delivery, and then once the ruling was made it applied to all the daily papers deposited for distribution from that particular office. So, as I said, the ridiculous proposition is that the Post Office Department takes the papers that are deposited in the center of publication for the rural routes originating from that city and charges you a pound rate when there is no added expense, and yet still continues to distribute it over the rail lines 5, 10, 15, or 17 miles away and does it for nothing.

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course that same argument could be made to apply to the regulations of the department with respect to city delivery, and yet the Senator must see how necessary it was to make that ruling.

Mr. HARDING. I do not argue for the free city delivery.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is the same proposition as the carrier service whether it is going along streets or along country roads.

Mr. HARDING. The Senator from Georgia will admit that except perhaps for the morning paper, and in that event it would not be attractive, there is no desire on the part of publishers to take advantage of a city delivery. The evening papers of the land are issued after the last residence delivery of the day as a rule. I mean a real evening paper, not an evening paper printed at 9 or 10 o'clock in the morning, but an evening paper that closes its forms approximately at 3 o'clock. It would not desire any postal service, certainly not one of delivery, because there could be no acceptable service; and, as a matter of fact, through the newsboy carriers publishers can deliver more cheaply than they could through the Post Office Department, and much more conveniently.

But the possibility of loading the free city delivery with local papers doubtless led to the ruling to guard against the undue burden. I only speak of it in passing because the Senator from Nebraska brought it up. It shows the ridiculous character of one of the regulations as to second-class mail service at the present day.

I am not sure but I should like to see a modified flat rate if there can be such a thing. I know it is contradictory in expression. I think it ought to be the policy of the Government to facilitate the distribution of the desirable periodicals. At the same time I recognize that almost any great periodical which we prize to have in our libraries is loaded up with quite as much advertising as reading matter; the two have become inseparable; but the main point is that if you put the burden upon advertising, you favor the publication of general distribution and you cripple the very essential restricted publication.

Let me tell the Senator precisely what I mean by that. I have no desire to advertise anybody on the floor of the Senate, but we will take what is probably one of the best-known general advertisers in the land, namely, the Royal Baking Powder Co. The Royal Baking Powder Co. does not need to use my publication or the publication of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] or that of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to reach its large constituency in Nebraska or Michigan or Ohio. It can reach them through what we call general publications, or publications of general distribution. If you tax us on the advertising of that client, you will make us apply a rate that will drive him out of our publications, while you are favoring the publication of general distribution and offering him a subsidized method of reaching the public.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will it bother the Senator from Ohio if I interrupt him?

Mr. HARDING. No; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. How can we do that if we charge them all just what it costs to render the service and no more?

Mr. HARDING. I am very frank to reply to the Senator from Georgia that I do not think we can maintain the encouraging attitude of the Postal Department in distributing publications and have any rule that is precisely equitable in every case, but the objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia is that he is going to cripple the man who is least able to stand the burden.

Mr. HARDWICK. How?

Mr. HARDING. As the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] suggests, you consolidate the advertising business of what we call the general advertiser; and by "general advertiser" I mean the man whose advertisement appeals to all communities in the land——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDING. Pardon me until I make that a little more clear. The Washington merchant who is the big advertiser in a publication of this city and uses a page or a double page advertisement appeals only to this community and tributary trading territory. You can not fancy, for example, that some great general advertiser who is simply promoting publicity concerning his product would take such space in a Washington publication. Such an instance is very rare. He goes to the great Philadelphia or New York or Chicago publication, the periodical, which has a distribution throughout the country.

Take the farm journal which was brought into the discussion here a little while ago. The advertising in the farm journal has nothing to do with special offerings for next week or even next month; it takes a staple article and advocates its purchase; but the advertisement that goes into the farm journal is of just as much interest, just as much appeal, to the farmer of Georgia, perhaps, as it is to the farmer in Iowa, or in Montana, or in Ohio, or in Massachusetts. That journal is reaching out all over the country and has its clientele everywhere. Now I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I was going to ask the Senator from Ohio if he would not carry out the specific illustration a little further. He said that the advertisement, for instance, of the Royal Baking Powder, would be driven out of the newspapers scattered over the country and carried into publications of a general circulation. First, I want to ask the Senator to what kind of publications would it be driven? After it has been driven to such publications, would not the increased rate provided in the amendment of the Senator from Georgia applying to those of general circulation carrying advertising all over the country reach them all and protect the other publications?

Mr. HARDING. Oh, no, Mr. President; it would not, and I believe I can make that clear.

Of course, scientific advertising is paid for according to the circulation. If it is a good one, a newspaper may reasonably have a circulation somewhat approximating from one-eighth to one-quarter of the population of the city or community in which it is published, though perhaps that is high. The price of advertising is, therefore, figured on the per thousand circulation The Saturday Evening Post, for example, advertises more than a million copies weekly. Have I gotten that high enough?

Mr. NEW. Two million.

Mr. HARDING. Two millions. I do not want to do it an injustice in speaking in this official way. Very well; let us say it has a circulation of two millions weekly. That publication can carry an advertisement at a rate per thousand circulation infinitely below what it can be carried in the publication boasting only 10,000 circulation. If you give the flat rate, you make possible the tremendous circulation of such publications, and they can take their advertising at a rate which permits them to pay extra postage on advertising on a flat basis and still sell their product or their publicity at a rate that will invite trade; but if you put the same burden on the limited publication, it must charge so much for general advertising that it will lose its following among the so-called general advertisers.

That is not true of the local advertiser. The advertiser in a restricted publication can reach his constituency in no other way. He is bound, if he uses any, to use the means of publicity provided in his particular territory. Of course, if you drive out the foreign advertiser—the general advertiser—who may contribute anywhere from 10 to 30 per cent of the advertising of any publication, you handicap the publication of local character. I wonder if I make myself clear?

We sometimes use the term "foreign" and sometimes use the term "general"; they are practically synonymous in the thought which I have in mind. I mean the advertiser from a distance who chooses a local publication but who has an article the purchase of which is general. If you put on the local paper the burden of the same cost of distribution that you put on the publication of general circulation, you will drive that advertising out of the restricted publication.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio of course is theorizing, and I think I follow him pretty well. Why has not the existing law, with its flat rate, done practically the same thing, then?

Mr. HARDING. I can not agree that a flat rate will reach it.

Mr. HARDWICK. We have a flat rate already under existing law of a cent a pound and fractions thereof.

Mr. HARDING. At the present time we have such an insufficient rate of charge for distribution that it does not affect anybody.

Mr. HARDWICK. But it is the same for all; the publications of national circulation pay the same rates as others, and every argument which the Senator has made applies to one just as well as it does to the other.

Mr. HARDING. If the Senator will allow me, I think the present system has already had a very serious effect on local publications. There is no doubt about that. But the inadequate postage rate has not been of sufficient importance to make itself felt.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HARDING. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. In the case the Senator puts, of the Saturday Evening Post, for instance. That publication coming into the field that is covered by the Senator's newspaper would have to pay a much higher rate of transportation, if the amendment of the Senator from Georgia were agreed to, to get into that field than the Senator's newspaper would have to pay.

Mr. HARDING. I do not so understand it.

Mr. HARDWICK. It would.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; that is my understanding of it.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is right.

Mr. HARDING. If the Senator is going to make the illustration apply to my very local paper——

Mr. NORRIS. I only use that as an illustration.

Mr. HARDING. I am very glad to have the Senator use it, except that it does not bring out the point, except to a limited exent, because a large part of my publication is freely distributed.

Mr. NORRIS. Take any other publication, then, in Ohio.

Mr. HARDING. All right; let us take the Washington Star or the Washington Times.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want to take either one of those, because they are published here. Take Philadelphia, where the Saturday Evening Post is published, or take the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Mr. HARDING. Very well.

Mr. NORRIS. That has a clientele in Cleveland and in that vicinity. An advertisement published in that paper for, let us say, the Royal Baking Powder, which the Senator from Ohio mentions, would be distributed at a less cost to the publisher than if the same advertisement appeared in the Saturday Evening Post, which is published in Philadelphia; at least, that is my understanding of the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDING. It would, if published in the same number; but the Senator's amendment puts the tax on advertising space and drops the zone rate, if I understand it correctly.

Mr. NORRIS. I myself believe in the zone rate, and I do not agree with the Senator's amendment in that respect; but I was thinking that it had that merit at least that the Senator was not giving it credit for. I may be mistaken about that, however.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HARDING. I do.

Mr. HARDWICK. I wonder if the Senator from Ohio does not see the danger of the zone system causing a narrow, provincial, and restricted press?

Mr. HARDING. I quite agree with the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. That, of course, is an important governmental situation to be considered.

Mr. HARDING. I quite agree, and I am very frank to say that I should not favor so drastic a proposition as that presented by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. But it has seemed to me that we somehow might get to a fair compromise by a moderate increase of rate under a zone plan which should still make possible the general distribution of the periodicals of this country.

I have no sympathy, so far as I am concerned, with the limited cost of maintaining nation-wide newspaper distribution. The Senator from Tennessee brought up a rather interesting point. Of course in the very elaborate and complete publication of the news, it is not possible throughout the United States in all cities to have publications like, for example, the New York Times or the Chicago Tribune. It is not possible, because advertising revenues on which to base such publications are not generally obtained. Nevertheless in this modern day of news distribution with three great distributing agencies operating both day and night, namely, the Associated Press, the United Press, and the International Press, the essential news of the world is published simultaneously throughout the United States.

There is not the wealth of editorial comment, some of which I would be willing to do without; there is not the tremendous portrayal of shipping and sometimes of cable news that you will find in papers published in great centers of population like New York, but, nevertheless, throughout the United States, where newspapers worth while have developed, there is the essential preservation of the news of the world. If it were not unseemly to say it, I would venture to put into the RECORD that in 50 interior cities in Ohio ranging from 20,000 to 50,000 and 60,000 population the real news of the world is as amply presented every evening or every morning as is necessary for the welfare of any citizen of the United States.

I think, Mr. President and Senators, that it is a mighty good thing to follow the policy that encourages that sort of publication. I would not give a rap for any New York paper two or three days old in these modern days, unless I could have no fresher issue. I very much enjoy reading the Chicago papers, but they come to the cloak rooms of the Senate a day old, and you will rarely find one gazing on their pages except he has a local interest in the community. That is because the news of the world has been thrashed over while it is fresh and worth while. This is a tremendously modern and wonderful age in newspaper publishing. Why, Mr. President, it not infrequently happens in the United States of America that there are published the details of a great event over in Europe three hours before it happened, owing to the variation in time. We read of the thing at 4 o'clock that happened at 6 or 7.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HARDING. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I am disposed to say to the Senator that in his exceedingly interesting discussion of this question in respect of which he is so well versed he has made the best argument I have ever heard against the proposition that he laid down in conjunction with the Senator from Georgia that the zone system would tend to provincialism. It seems to me the Senator's discussion of the question has almost demonstrated that the zone system would not do that.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I wish the Senator from Nebraska would do me the credit to differentiate between newspapers and periodicals.

Mr. NORRIS. I would be glad to do that; I think there is a great difference.

Mr. HARDING. I make one statement with reference to newspapers, and I must of necessity modify it in speaking of periodicals.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish the Senator would now give us the periodical end of it, as he has given us the newspaper end.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I am perfectly frank to say that I am not prepared to offer a solution of that question. It brings me back to the statement I made in the beginning that I think this problem has no business in the revenue bill. I quite agree that there must be a revision of second-class postal rates, but that matter has not any business in the revenue bill, because the newspapers of the land are subjected to all of the taxes proposed in that measure the same as other institutions. I think it is an outrage to propose a specific and special tax on advertising receipts—I do not care whether the proposal comes from the committee or elsewhere—because the newspaper that is making any money must pay just the same as any other American institution.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HARDING. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think the Senator is right. This matter ought to be worked out carefully by the committees charged with the responsibility. The same thing is true about the important question actually pending before the Senate—the increase of first-class mail rates.

Mr. HARDING. I am glad the Senator is in accord with me as to that. I believe I started to say a little while ago that I can not understand why the Congress of the United States is unwilling or afraid to take up and settle this question as it ought to be settled. I understand, of course, that the proposal to make the publications of the land pay their just dues has made and unmade Presidents. It has been very strongly stated that former President Taft came into disfavor largely through the ill will of the publications because he had recommended a settlement of this question.

I will say for myself that I do not care a continental about that phase of the question. As a publisher myself, in a small way, I am in favor of being made to pay what I ought to pay to the Government for the service received at the hands of the Government. If there are Senators on this floor who are fearful of their political future because the publishers of the land are everlastingly crying out against this thing, let them be assured that if we do the thing that is wholly just they will come into their reward.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HARDING. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Would not the Senator from Ohio like to have sufficient time afforded to enable him to distribute the added burdens upon his business which have accumulated unexpectedly in a year and which it is difficult to carry?

Mr. HARDING. I quite agree with the Senator from Michigan, and I have already stated in my remarks that under any circumstances the rate which is finally to be adopted ought to be made effective at least a year from the time of the passage of the bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. And three years is allowed in my proposal.

Mr. HARDING. I am not sure but that would be right. Let me elaborate, Mr. President, just a moment on that thought.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Before the Senator enters upon that, would not the Senator like some fair assurance that the increased cost of white paper would not continue to pile up on him? Last year it added a burden of thirty or forty thousand dollars to some one whom I know very well, and this year it adds $25,000 more. There ought to be some place where the cost of producing news print paper could be regulated with a fair degree of accuracy, without attempting to impose additional burdens calculated to really put many publications out of business.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I address a question to the Senator from Michigan?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to his colleague?

Mr. HARDING. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not know how I will fare between the two Ohio Senators.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator is able to take care of himself. The question is this: Both my colleague and the Senator from Michigan have referred to the increased cost of paper, and I have no doubt that they have investigated that subject, because they have both been victimized by the increased cost of print paper. Do not the Senators think that if the question of the increased cost of paper is thoroughly investigated by the courts some relief will be afforded?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, it was investigated last year, and the relief with which I am most familiar has been an added cost. I think I am violating no confidence at all when I say that on the very day that the Federal Trade Commission report was made with reference to the news-print paper situation there was an advance in the price of white paper to a farm journal published in Iowa that was so stupendous that I dislike, without refreshing my memory, to attempt to quote the figures; but it was a most exorbitant charge.

Mr. POMERENE. Is it not true that most of the manufacturers of print paper had agreed with the Federal Trade Commission to make a very substantial reduction?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, I think I will let the Senator's colleague answer that, as he is more familiar with that question than I am.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, it is a fact that more than 50 per cent of those representing the print-paper production in this country agreed to an experimental reduction in the price of news-print paper under the regulations of the Federal Trade Commission. It so happened, however, that while that agreement was in the process of making the Department of Justice, very properly, I think, brought indictments against a number of news print paper manufacturers in this country, to have them prosecuted for their activities contrary to the law in restraint of trade. The bringing of the indictments upset the voluntary arrangement which had been made with the Federal Trade Commission, and, instead of helping the situation, had a tendency to make it temporarily worse.

I think it is fair to say, in answering my colleague, that it is not surprising that there is a considerable increased cost of paper incident to war times. It is rather a contradictory thing, but it is nevertheless true, that war brings an excessive demand in the use of print paper and not infrequently creates conditions where newspaper net revenues are very much reduced, because among other things, since we are revealing the secrets of the trade, if they are to be termed such, war has added unspeakably to the cost of gathering news. I wish I might say for the enlightenment of such few Senators as are honoring me with their attention just how much increased cost cable and wireless reports of the activities on the war fronts of Europe have entailed upon the press of the United States; the sum is enormously large. So, with the inroads on the supply of labor in the spruce forests of Canada and with the increased cost of labor in the mills of the United States and of Canada, it is fair to say that there must of necessity be an increased cost in paper. Then we have the rather ridiculous outcome of a panic among the publishers of this land.

I dislike to offer my notion of the origin of the increased cost of paper, especially to such a genial body as represents the majority in the Senate at this time; but I have a very strong conviction that it began when we revised the tariff and stopped the development of American mills. Senators smile, but it will sometimes bear your investigation, because from the time you passed the Underwood law we never added a single mill to American production, while we were adding constantly to American consumption; and we were going along at a high consumption rate and getting our added requirements from Canada until the war broke. Then came the panic about the print-paper supply, and of course the great publications of the cities, using carloads upon carloads a week, were able to step into the market and by conceding a little advance over the price they were paying they made inroads into the supply, so that the smaller publishers, who cut relatively little figure in the transactions of the mills, were made the victims of the situation.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], I understand, is interested in a publication in the city of Grand Rapids. I will ask him what is the population of Grand Rapids?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. About 135,000.

Mr. HARDING. I should have said more; but the Senator says 135,000. Surely the consumption of paper by his publication is very much larger than that of my newspaper in a town of 25,000 or 30,000; and without ever having questioned him on the subject, I will venture to make the statement that the Senator from Michigan pays from one-half to three-fourths of a cent or 1 cent per pound less for news-print paper than I am obliged to pay, and I shall not be surprised if he is not obliged to pay considerably more than the publications in Chicago and in New York. That is not a surprising thing. To follow the illustration a little further, there came to my notice a little daily newspaper in Rapid City, N. Dak., I think, that was paying the outlandish rate of 8 cents per pound for paper in carload lots, when the Federal Trade Commission had figures to show that the average cost of production was really less than 1.60 cents per pound, or $32 per ton.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HARDING. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to ask the Senator a question. I read a statement that was widely published some months ago that the investigation of the Federal Trade Commission and their notification to the print-paper dealers that they would have to adjust their prices more satisfactorily to the consumers had resulted in a great reduction in the price of print paper. Has not that been beneficial to the newspaper men?

Mr. HARDING. It has not materialized.

Mr. BORAH. Well, what do you newspaper men carry such literature to the people for, unless there is some basis for it?

Mr. HARDING. I do not know precisely why the Senator from Idaho says "you newspaper men." There were, of course, hopes that the negotiations of the Federal Trade Commission would result in a helpful modification of the situation, and for a time there were very bright prospects. It was rather an unusual situation.

For example—and I use my own illustration not because it is important but because I am familiar with it—I was paying the very extravagant sum of $3.50 to $3.75 per hundred for news print, and the Federal Trade Commission secured an assent, if I may use that term, from representatives of 50 per cent of the production of the country to try a period of furnishing news print in carload-lot delivery at two and a half cents, which was a very material reduction; and it was fixed on that basis because there was one very large producer in the United States, perhaps the largest individual producer in the United States, which, without any interference by the Trade Commission, without any pressure from any source, maintained essentially the same level of prices that existed prior to 1916. But when the investigations of the Federal Department of Justice led to an indictment of some of the principals said to be involved in the increased price of paper the negotiations for a voluntary experimental period were all declared off; and if there has been a reduction in the price of news print as the result of any negotiations I am not in any way aware of it, and I very much doubt if it exists, principally because, without a voluntary arrangement having been made, contracts covering 1917 must of necessity be carried out.

I can not repudiate a contract with any print-paper producer unless he voluntarily comes to me and says, "You may cancel your contract. We will furnish you your paper at a reduced price."

Mr. BORAH. Then the fact is, whatever may have been the cause, that this investigation did not result in decreasing the price at all?

Mr. HARDING. It did not. It only resulted in a promised decrease, which never eventuated.

Mr. BORAH. Another economic reform fails to bear fruit.

Mr. HARDING. I may add to the Senator's closing observation that it is disappointing to me as to those who study Government methods and expect a miracle to be accomplished by those who love us so much.

Mr. President, I have drifted quite away from the matter we had under discussion, and I believe I shall not attempt to detain the Senate longer, except to say, in closing these rambling remarks, that it is a rather unfair proposition, in difficult times like these, to single out the publication world for a special tax on receipts. It is manifestly unfair to undertake to remedy an existing evil in the hurry of considering a war-revenue bill when it ought to be founded on the most painstaking investigation, so that we may have a scientific solution of the problem of second-class mail distribution.

So, then, my notion about it is that the Senate ought to eliminate all of this from the pending revenue bill, and, at the earliest possible day in the regular session of Congress soon to come, take up this matter in a determination to straighten it out along scientific lines and call upon the publishers of the United States to pay to the Government what they owe for the distribution of their publications.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am very glad that the Senate Finance Committee saw fit to eliminate from the House bill the tax on advertising. I agree with my colleague [Mr. HARDING], and others who have expressed themselves upon that subject, that it would be entirely unjust to have one method of taxation applied to one institution and another to another.

But I can not agree with those Senators who seem to take the position that we should not provide for an increase in second-class rates at this particular time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beckham	James	Martin	Shields
Borah	Johnson, Cal.	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	New	Smith, Md.
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Smoot
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Page	Sterling
Dillingham	Kellogg	Penrose	Sutherland
Fernald	Kendrick	Phelan	Thompson
Fletcher	Kenyon	Poindexter	Townsend
France	King	Pomerene	Trammell
Gerry	La Follette	Ransdell	Vardaman
Hale	Lewis	Robinson	Wadsworth
Harding	McCumber	Saulsbury
Hardwick	McKellar	Shafroth
Husting	McNary	Sheppard

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, when the absence of a quorum was suggested I had just completed a statement to the effect that I was glad that the Finance Committee had eliminated from the House bill a tax on advertising. Clearly, it is a tax on gross receipts, just as much as a tax on sales would be; but I can not agree with those Senators who seem to take the position that we should not provide for an increase in second-class rates at this particular time.

I know it is urged that this is making a change in the postal laws, and that that should be given the special attention of the Post Office Committee, and that before we do anything upon this subject there should be a thorough and a complete investigation of the subject. I know that it is always suggested that we defer legislation when certain interests are to be affected thereby, particularly if they are enjoying what may be regarded as a bonus from the Government. There are two classes of pensions which we are granting in this country now. One is to the soldier, and one is to the publisher. The pension to the old soldier is rightly given, and theoretically, at least, we grant that pension in proportion to the length of his service or to the condition of his health, or in accordance with the extent of his disabilities.

But when it comes to the pension which we are giving to the publisher, we increase the pension in proportion to his wealth, in proportion to the size of his commodity, so that we have instances of poor publishers to whom we are giving possibly a few hundred dollars' worth of privileges, and we give to another man, because he has some enormous publication like the Curtis publications, hundreds of thousands of dollars, nay, millions, because he has a larger need for the post-office facilities. I submit that it is not quite a square deal, either to the small publisher or to the American citizen generally.

It has been stated here to-day, and there can not be very much question about the correctness of the figures, that on first-class postage we are making a net profit of from sixty million to seventy million dollars per year. For many years the second-class postal rates have been, as they are now, 1 cent a pound, and the Government gets from the publishers of the country $11,000,000 annually—I give round numbers only—for a service which costs the country about $80,000,000 per annum or more. This has continued for many, many years; and every time an attempt is made in either House of Congress to compel the publishers to pay at least a modicum of the cost of the services which they are receiving from the Government we are confronted with the cry that this matter has not been sufficiently investigated.

We are carrying the newspapers and the magazines of this country at a cost of 7 or 8 cents per pound, and we receive from them 1 cent per pound; and there never has been a more persistent campaign conducted in behalf of or against any measure that ever has been presented to Congress than that which is being conducted now by the publishers of the country to continue their present privileges.

I am here to say that if we were to attempt to give this same bonus to any other interest in the country a cry would go forth throughout the length and breadth of this land against Senators and Congressmen who would engage in that kind of legislation which would be loud enough to drive them from public life.

Senators know this quite as well as I do, and yet they are constantly engaging in the cry that we should not increase these rates because the publications are doing a public service. Of course they are, and of course we want a free press, and of course we want the public to have the benefit of it; but this is a business proposition, and it ought to be treated as such.

Senators have referred to the fact that an average of perhaps 50 per cent of the space in the newspapers and magazines is now being filled with advertising matter. That advertising matter in the columns of the newspapers and magazines is just as much merchandise as the merchandise that they are advertising. I am not yet willing to believe that the advertisers of this country will not be willing to pay a sufficient increase in their advertising rates to pay for carrying their advertising matter to their customers, actual or prospective; and I am not willing to believe that the readers of this country—and they constitute the vast proportion of our 100,000,000 people—are not willing to pay the cost of carrying their mail matter; and if they are not willing to pay the cost of transportation of any newspaper or magazine, it is probably because they are not worth the increase in price.

Mr. President, I happen to know that there are a good many publishers in this country who are not pleased with the fact that they are constantly the recipients of bonuses from the Government and they want this law changed.

I mean that class of publishers who believe in a square deal for the public, who believe in paying for the service that they get. They neither ask nor want legislative favors.

Mr. President, out in my State there is a newspaper man publishing one of the best of our small dailies. It is called the Portsmouth Daily Times. It is printed at Portsmouth, Ohio. It is one of the best of the smaller publications in that or any other State. The publisher wrote me some time ago upon this subject. I have a copy of his letter here, and I want to send it to the desk and ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE PORTSMOUTH DAILY TIMES,
PORTSMOUTH, OHIO.

DEAR SENATOR: I wish to express my hearty approval of your stand on the matter of newspapers and periodicals paying their way through the Postal Service. We are engaged in a legitimate commercial business, and we have no right to ask or expect that the Government shall carry our papers at a loss as is being done now. I am confident that the great majority of publishers engaged in legitimate business feel about it as I do and are willing to pay their way with the Government or anyone else.

Sincerely,

HARRY E. TAYLOR.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, later this same publisher and editor wrote me another letter. I am going to read a paragraph from it. There are some things in it that are personal, and, of course, I do not care to have them in the RECORD.

I have always felt that the drawback to the newspaper business was that it was not generally recognized as a legitimate commercial enterprise. It was the custom so long for publishers of newspapers to sit around at the back doors with their hands out, begging for alms, that newspaper men came to be regarded as a sort of high-class mendicant—a sort of necessary evil, as it were. Newspaper men seemed to think, and religiously cultivated the idea, that they could not get along without subsidies and concessions from city, county, State, and National Governments in the way of special privileges. It has seemed to me that the sooner we get away entirely from this idea and stand squarely on our feet, paying our way as we go, neither asking nor accepting favors, the better it will be for all of us.

Mr. President, while we are dwelling upon this subject, I have another letter from Mr. John A. Penton, of the Penton Publishing Co., of Cleveland, Ohio. This company publishes a number of papers: The Iron Trade Review, the Daily Iron Trade and Metal Market Report, the Foundry, Power Boating, the Marine Review, A, B, C of Iron and Steel, Penton's Foundry List, Great Lakes Red Book, and Elliott's Weights of Steel. I send this letter to the desk and ask that it may be read as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE PENTON PUBLISHING CO.,
Cleveland, June 7, 1917.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: We desire to make a protest against the suggestion to increase, particularly at this time, the cost of letter postage to the people of the United States. A burden of more than $60,000,000 a year would be imposed upon them if Congress puts into effect the proposal to advance the rate of the ordinary letter from 2 to 3 cents and of the postal card from 1 to 2 cents. This is seriously contemplated despite the fact that over $70,000,000 is given annually as a subsidy to the publishers of America in the form of a rate of 1 cent a pound for carrying their publications when it costs perhaps 7 or more cents a pound to perform this service.

Receiving the benefit of this service there are actually, for instance, monthly publications weighing as little as 75 to the pound. In other words, one of these periodicals must be carried and delivered through the mails for six and one-fourth years for 1 cent.

A subsidy such as this is outrageous. In our judgment it would be entirely justifiable for our Government to pay a bounty to build up our merchant marine, which involves international competition; but in our domestic business Government aid is unwarranted, and those accepting it do, in a sense either consciously or unconsciously, make of themselves objects of charity. Congress has no jurisdiction over foreign ships, which, under normal conditions, are the recipients of Government aid of one kind or another, but it might well overcome the handicap resting against American ships by some character of Federal assistance. Congress has, however, complete jurisdiction over all domestic enterprises, including publications.

The daily, weekly, and monthly periodicals of the United States have in a majority of cases carried on an incessant campaign against every real and imaginary form of special privilege for many years. At the same time they are themselves the greatest, most insistent, irrepressible, and unyielding seekers for Government aid in this or any other Nation. There is no more excuse, economic, educational, or sentimental, for this unrestrained expenditure of public funds than there would be were the Federal Treasury to subsidize our railroads, street cars, lighting systems, department or corner grocery stores.

To hand over $70,000,000 annually to the publishers simply because they demand it is to yield to a "hold-up" of the most brazen kind. It is an example of Government extravagance which every Senator and Representative must know is indefensible.

To do this and then attempt to further penalize the business interests of America, who are the large buyers of postage stamps, while our first-class postage already shows a profit of upward of $80,000,000 a year, is but little short of a crime.

To say the least, it is unmoral, and our company does not desire to be the beneficiary of a system that is as much of a reflection upon those who receive it as it is upon those who give it.

Yours, sincerely,

JOHN A. PENTON, President.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I may say that Mr. Penton, who is the president of this company and the largest owner of stock in it, as I understand, if not the owner of the entire stock, prints these valued trade papers and insists that it is his duty as an American citizen at this time to pay for the service that he is receiving from the Government of the United States. A good many of the metropolitan journals take the same position. I have before me an editorial that was printed in the New York Tribune of June 4, 1917, under the title "Take away the subsidy." I ask that it be incorporated in my remarks. I shall not take the time of the Senate to read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection. It is so ordered.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Tribune, June 4, 1917.]

TAKE AWAY THE SUBSIDY.

The periodical publishers who appeared before the Senate Finance Committee on Saturday in a desperate effort to defeat an increase in second-class postal rates were unusually frank in their arguments. Their one fixed idea is to retain the subsidy which the Government now grants them in the shape of undercharges on the carriage of second-class mail matter.

They admit that they want to go on enjoying that subsidy, and they realize that, once it has been withdrawn, the Government will never restore it. They are therefore anxious to substitute for an equalization of second-class rates, which will be permanent in character because justified by sound principles of postal administration, a purely emergency tax on the volume of newspaper and magazine advertising. They could ask for a repeal of this tax when the war is over. But they have no hope that a scientific revision of second-class rates, through the introduction of the zone system created by the House bill can ever be upset. It is obvious that a trial of such a scheme for a year or two would vindicate it completely. There would then be as little chance of a relapse to the old flat rate undercharge on second-class matter for the benefit of publishers unwilling to pay their way as there would be of a revival of the old parcel-post flat-rate system, with its ludicrous limitation on weight, for the benefit of the once all-powerful express companies.

A general tax on advertising, with a retention of the discriminating and inadequate flat rate on second-class matter, would simply continue the glaring inequalities which every investigating commission has found to exist in the second-class mail service. The Government has been devoting millions of dollars every year to promoting the sale of periodicals and newspapers which avail themselves of the long-haul privileges granted under existing postal laws. It carries bulky second-class mail from New York to San Francisco for the same charge for which it carries it from New York to Philadelphia. The newspaper or magazine sent 1,000 miles or 3,000 miles is delivered at a heavy loss to the Post Office Department. Circulation facilities are thus furnished at the public expense and publications of wide circulation are unfairly benefited.

There is no reason why the Government should carry mail of any sort at a loss. There is even less reason why it should make the same charge for carrying bulky matter 3,000 miles as it does for carrying it 50 miles. The zone system of rates, which proportions cost to service, is the only rational system to apply to second-class or to parcel-post matter. It establishes justice between different classes of shippers, and it brings the Government a proper return for the longer haul. The inadequate flat rate is an undesirable form of Government charity.

Mr. SIMMONS, the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, showed a thorough grasp of the situation when he told the publishers who appeared at Washington that "now is the psychological time to dispose of the postal-rate question." That is the truth. Congress has been wrestling with the problem for years, and every intelligent Congressman knows that the present second-class rate scheme is vicious and out of date. Now, the publication business is expected to do its part in providing more revenue for the Government. It can save the Treasury $40,000,000 or $60,000,000 or $80,000,000 a year—according to various estimates—by surrendering its present second-class mail subsidy. It should be willing to do this without protest. It should greatly prefer to a general tax on advertising an abandonment of its ancient and costly second-class privilege—a privilege, too, whose benefits are absorbed by a relatively small class of publications.

The zone system of second-class rates must come in time, because it is fair and scientific. Congress knows that it is wrong, but has lacked the courage to antagonize its powerful beneficiaries. Now, the exigencies of war make the accomplishment of this long-delayed postal reform easy. We trust that Chairman SIMMONS will live up to his convictions and will hold the committee with him. An emergency tax on newspaper and periodical advertising will be unnecessary if the second-class rates are intelligently readjusted. The bill passed by the House of Representatives made such a readjustment. In our opinion, the Senate should go back to the House provision in spite of the clamor of the subsidists who are now besetting the Finance Committee.

Mr. POMERENE. I should like Senators to tell me what defense can be made at this particular time of a continuation of this subsidy in its entirety. I know what the argument is. They tell us that there is an advance in the price of print paper and of all the materials which the publishers have to buy. But assuming for the sake of argument that this statement is true, and it is true, is that any reason why we should continue to render this almost gratuitous service to this particular class of American citizens? When they preach economy, when they complain against extravagance in Government, and I am in accord with much they say upon that subject, would not their editorials have a truer ring if they were to come before the American Senate and say, "We want you to treat us as you are treating everybody else"? But no, there is a constant appeal for a continuation of these privileges, amounting to $70,000,000 a year.

I have no doubt that my experience has been substantially the experience of every Senator in his correspondence with his constituents relative to this revenue measure. I have been very agreeably surprised that there has been so little complaint as has come to me. Nearly all the letters that I get are suggestions with reference to the making of changes which will equalize the burdens and very few of them are trying to get away from the burden of taxation, and they suggest, if necessary, to increase the taxes.

Mr. President, when we write to our constituents and say to them it is necessary in order to defray the expenses of Government to carry on the war that we increase the burden of taxation they reply, "Well and good; if that is the purpose, we are content." But let me ask, Senators, when one of these constituents who is being heavily taxed comes back to you and says to you or to me, "You told me that it was necessary to levy this tax in order to defray the expenses of the war, but I find at the same time you have under consideration some legislation which would require the publishers who have been receiving a bounty from the Government to pay a little increased proportion of the expenses of carrying their publications, and now you are taking nearly $70,000,000 of the money that will be raised from the other taxpayers and turning it over to the publishers of the country." What answer are Senators going to make to it? Let me be a little more specific.

I have before me the second part of the hearings before the Finance Committee. I find an estimate here of certain taxes that they are about to levy on tea and coffee and cocoa. From tea it is expected to raise $10,000,000; from coffee it is expected to raise $57,500,000; from cocoa it is expected to raise $7,000,000; in all, $74,500,000. You are taking these millions from the breakfast table of all the people of the country. What are you doing with it? The publishers of the country—the Curtis Publishing Co. that has been getting a bonus amounting to $5,138,000 a year—comes here and in effect says to you, "Turn over the money to us that you are collecting from tea and coffee and cocoa." Will Senators defend it? There is no defense that can be made by any publisher to that proposition.

No, Mr. President, it is unfortunate that every time a measure of this kind comes up we have a propaganda started the purpose of which is to continue this privilege. I have here a memorial to the Congress of the United States from the editors of some of the principal American periodicals. It is dignified; it is well written; and at the end of it are the facsimiles of the signatures of perhaps 30 or 40 of the different editors of different periodicals of the country. The first name on it is the name Lyman Abbott, editor of the Outlook. The last name is Hamilton Holt, editor of the Independent. Among other names are the editors of the Saturday Evening Post, McCall's Magazine, Woman's Home Companion, McClure's Magazine, and a number of others. I will not take the time to read them, but I should like to see an editorial in one of these magazines defending this Congress if they assess millions upon the coffee and tea and cocoa which is consumed by our people and turn it over to the publishers. I should like to try a case involving that issue before a jury of their peers. I dare say they would not win.

Mr. President, the publishers of these magazines will not dare to tell their readers that they are getting this bonus of $70,000,000 a year. The distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], who has given a good deal of attention to this subject, quoted from the testimony of one of the experts who appeared before the Finance Committee to the effect that since the enactment of the particular statute that extends this privilege the Government has given to the publishers $700,000,000. I know, Mr. President, it is very unpopular to take up a subject of this sort. I know it is dangerous, perhaps, from a political standpoint and a personal standpoint, but I would rather be in private life than vote to continue this kind of a bonus to any set of men on earth.

I had a statement here showing the amount of the contributions which the Government is making to a number of these large publications and giving the figures showing the cost. I am not able to lay my hands on it just at this moment, but I shall be glad later on to put it in the RECORD.

Several weeks ago I was waited upon by a very debonair gentlemen in the marble room. He approached me with this proposition: The Government ought to conduct its business upon a high business plane. I was in hearty accord with that suggestion. I was a little curious to know what the business proposition was which he was going to present to the United States Senate. It was a most interesting proposition, and it was in substance that there would soon be another issue of liberty bonds amounting to several billion dollars and that the Government, which is now straining every nerve in order to win this war and to pay the expenses of it, should not have this advertising done in the way in which it was done during the last loan campaign, but that it should pay to the publishers of the country $3,000,000 in order to advertise the bonds which we are selling for their safety as well as ours. I suggested that I would not have any objection to his proposition on one condition, and that was that they conduct their business with the Government on a business plane and pay for the service that they have been getting for so many years from the taxpayers of the country. Some one sent me the other day a copy of a paper called the Editor and Publisher, printed in New York, under date of August 11, 1917. I note that the very same men who are opposing the increase of this postage are conducting a giant campaign to get $3,000,000 more from the Government for advertising these bonds. The headlines on the first page are these:

Planned gigantic exploitation of newspapers in floating liberty bonds—Same forces that put over initial issue have been summoned to deliver newspapers again—Unless publishers forestall present plans, there will be a repetition of the wasteful and undemocratic methods of advertising and selling—Expert advertising men declare an appropriation for successful campaign need not exceed $3,000,000.

Let me read a paragraph or two from the middle of the page:

The Editor and Publisher suggests that publishers of newspapers should at once write letters to their Representatives in Congress and to Secretary McAdoo protesting against a repetition in the offering of the next issue of liberty loan bonds of the policy of blundering which was followed by the first sale.

The blunder was that most of this advertising was being done without expense to the Government.

Again on the next page—I suspect Senators have gotten the letters from these publishers bearing on this subject. Mr. Cortland Smith is the manager of one of these associations which reach a lot of the country papers, and he has this significant remark to make. It appears over his own name:

If the bread and butter of editors must be taken to pay the way, then let the President of the United States, his Cabinet, and the Members of Congress forego their wages.

But he says nothing about the bonus which they have been getting from the country during all these years. It would take $3,982,500 to pay the salaries of all the Senators and all the Representatives one year, and the amount of bonus to the publishers of this country because of this very low rate of 1 cent a pound amounts to about $70,000,000 each year. If we would lay that amount aside we would have enough public funds to pay the salaries of all the Senators and all the Representatives for nearly 18 years.

On this same page 7 of the Editor and Publisher is the following language:

Now, I believe all this volunteering is wrong—and in a business sense immoral.

Senators who are going to vote to continue this privilege to the publishers ought to take to heart that text. If it is immoral for the Government to get its advertising by volunteering, it must be immoral to continue these privileges to these beneficiaries. Now, again, this paper says:

The Government has not asked for gratuitous supplies of woolen cloth, of leather, of copper, pig iron, chemicals, of automobiles, tentage, shipping—in fact, of any commodity needed to carry on the war.

That is true, but the writer might have added, if he wanted to be fair, did not these men, when they shipped their commodities, pay the cost of transportation?

On page 9 of this publication Mr. William C. Freeman writes this:

Is the Government of the United States so poor that it can not afford to do business on the same basis that the business men of the country do it, and have done it so successfully that they have accumulated for the United States of America the greatest wealth of any country in the world?

Well, we are as poor as we are by $70,000,000 because of the privilege that we have been giving to these publishers.

Mr. President, we ought to be fair about this matter. We require the users of first-class mail privilege to pay the expense of it and millions more and we are seeking now to add 50 per cent to the present rate. Why should the publishers insist upon this privilege further at this particular time? They say that they can not change their rates, due to the fact that the price of paper has been increased. It appears from the record of the testimony before the Senate committee that many of the magazines and periodicals are already increasing their rates. Rates have been increased upon advertising. One of the very distinguished editors of my own State, a man for whom I have the profoundest regard, said to me not long ago that because of the increased price of his paper it was going to consume his profits largely, and he went to his advertisers and called attention to the increased cost of operating his plant, and with rare exceptions they consented to an increase in advertising rates which would measure the differential in cost.

Mr. President, it is the experience of every business man some time during his career that he is obliged to increase the price of his output or to decrease it as market conditions require. Is there anything which should differentiate the newspaper from the ordinary commercial commodity when it comes to the question of price? I have not heard any Senator yet express himself upon this subject who did not concede that it costs the Government vastly more to render this service than it gets from the publishers.

They differ as to the amount. Some will say that the total cost is 5 cents a pound, some 6, some 7, some 8; but admitting that the lower figure is the correct one, is that any reason why we should not double or treble or quadruple the present rate, not perhaps at once, but do it by a graduation during a period of two or three years?

I am convinced that every Senator here believes we are operating the second-class mail at a loss. Now, if this increase is not to be made I wish to offer this suggestion, that we require the publishers to pay the actual cost of the delivery of these newspapers and magazines and then let us be fair with our constituencies, and if the publishers want this loss made good to them by Congress let us give them each year a check for the bonus they are now getting and which is now concealed from the public by giving rates less than cost.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. SHIELDS. If convenient for the Senator at this stage of the presentation of the subject, I would be glad to hear his views in regard to how the increase is to be made. Should it be made a flat rate so as to charge by zones a paper sent 40 or 50 miles as much as one that is sent two or three thousand miles and thus gets ten times the service or is ten times the expense to the Government? I wish further to say that the statement I have from the Post Office Department shows that within a radius of 300 miles the rate now charged pays practically all the expenses of transportation; but outside of that it does not pay it. I understand the statement of the Senator to be that at some places it costs 8 cents a pound to deliver this freight.

Mr. POMERENE. No; I made the statement that 8 cents per pound was one of the estimates of the average cost of this service to the Government.

Mr. SHIELDS. I say I understand the Senator is correct about it.

Mr. POMERENE. I did not so understand the Senator.

Mr. SHIELDS. While the present rate pays within 300 miles all the expense.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think the Senator from Tennessee is not correct in that statement. I trust nobody claims that the present rate pays all the expenses. They do claim it pays for the transportation, but no one claims that it pays more than that. They take into consideration no part of the overhead expenses, the charges of the Government, but simply insist that the first zone rate pays the actual transportation.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator is mistaken. I will present some figures which were authorized, which came from the department, showing that the transportation does not cost over about 48 per cent at the present charge.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may answer in part the query put to me by the Senator from Tennessee, I will say that thus far I have discussed only the question of the necessity of an increase, and, so far as my vote is concerned, at this particular time I am not going to split hairs as to the method of that increase. I do not expect to see the Senate vote here at this session to raise the rate so as to pay the entire cost. Any increase which I think will be made will be below cost. There will be abundance of opportunity later on to adopt some permanent method. There is much to be said in favor of the zone system. There is very great force in the objection which was made by the Senator from Georgia to the effect that we did not want to localize these publications, but that we wanted to give the readers generally the benefit of the best thought of the country, and if some one will be able to lay down a rule which will distinguish between the best thought and the worst thought of the country, all of which finds its way into the papers and magazines, I shall be very glad to discuss the question further with them.

Mr. President, I have just discovered the papers which I mislaid a moment ago. I have here a table from what is known as the National One-Cent Letter Postage Association of Cleveland, Ohio. They give certain interesting figures. If these are wrong, I will be glad to correct them if any of the parties referred to will present the evidence that they are wrong. The Country Gentleman, published by the Curtis Publishing Co., has a circulation of 189,870 per week. It has 22 pages of reading matter and 13 pages of advertising. The weight per year amounts to 2,400,000 pounds. They pay the Government $24.000 per year. It costs the Government $192,000 per year. The subsidy amounts to $168.000 per year.

The Ladies' Home Journal, with a monthly circulation of 1,852,000, has 40 pages of reading matter and 37 pages of advertising matter. The weight per year of this publication amounts to 19,000,000 pounds. They pay the Post Office Department $190,000. It costs the department per year $1,520,000, and their bonus is $1,330,000 annually.

The Saturday Evening Post, with a weekly circulation of 2,125,000 copies, has 35 pages of reading matter and 36 pages of advertising matter. The total weight of this publication is 52,000,000 pounds. They pay to the Government $520,000. It costs the United States Government $4,160,000 per year. Their bonus is $3,640,000, and the total estimated subsidy which is thus given to the Curtis Publishing Co. for mailing these three publications amounts to $5,138,000. Poor as I am, I think I could die rich if I had a subsidy of that kind.

Mr. President, I do not know that I care to discuss this question further. I recognize the fact that the publishers say, "Oh, yes; there are certain isolated cases of that kind, but the rest of us do not fare so well; we do not get so much." But each one of these publishing firms, no matter what its financial status may be, ought to be willing to pay for the privilege which it gets from the Federal Government.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I want to ask my colleague if he does not think it would be but fair for us to make the law effective approximately a year after its enactment, so that the publishers can readjust their subscription prices accordingly?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if we were going to charge the publishers with the full cost of this privilege now, I would hesitate about making them pay it immediately; but it is only the purpose of the different proposals here to charge the publishers a small portion of this expense. Bear in mind we are taking nothing from them; we are simply saying "you have had these privileges all these years, and you have fattened on the land." There is no reason, in my mind, why there should not be a reasonable increase now. Of course, there are other privileges which are not interfered with here at all, such as free transportation of a paper in its own county, outside, I believe, of the municipality in which the publication is issued.

If there is no way of getting any increase except by deferring the matter, I am willing to do that. My own thought, however, was, if either the amendment which has been proposed by the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] or by the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] is not accepted and nothing better can be done, that we double the rate of postage and make it 2 cents for the current year. It may be it should be more; but I am satisfied that the publishers themselves recognize the justice of this demand on the part of the public; and if they have any doubt about what the public is thinking in reference to this subject, let them go out among their own subscribers and inquire.

I recognize the fact that there has been a campaign conducted here by all sorts of organizations—society papers, religious papers, literary papers, historical papers, trade journals, labor papers—all of them thinking, perhaps, only of the privilege which each individual publication is getting, without thinking of the vast amount of money which is expended on behalf of all the publishers of the country. It would take but a very small increase, either in the advertising rates or in the increase in the subscription rates, to make up this difference that the Government is asking at this time if Congress passes legislation along this line. I think it ought to be done; and I do not know how we can square ourselves with our own sense of duty to the public by assessing vast taxes upon the public and giving this privilege to a favored few.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. KIRBY. I ask for a division, Mr. President.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I call for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Harding	McCumber	Shields
Beckham	Hardwick	McKellar	Smith, Mich.
Borah	Husting	Myers	Smoot
Broussard	James	New	Sterling
Calder	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Sutherland
Culberson	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Swanson
Curtis	Jones, N. Mex.	Page	Thompson
Dillingham	Jones, Wash.	Phelan	Townsend
Fernald	Kellogg	Poindexter	Trammell
Fletcher	Kendrick	Pomerene	Vardaman
France	Kenyon	Robinson	Wadsworth
Frelinghuysen	Kirby	Shafroth	Williams
Gerry	La Follette	Sheppard	Wolcott
Hale	Lewis	Sherman

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I desire to state that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] are necessarily absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask that the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 94, line 7, after the word "cards," it is proposed to insert "and private mailing or post cards."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, in view of some of the remarks which have been made to-day, it seems to me that it may not be inadvisable to make a short statement as coming from the committee. The committee has been criticized quite severely, especially by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], for having undertaken to deal with the question of postal rates at all. I think it well that we should understand just how this matter arises.

The bill as it came over from the other House had a provision increasing the rate of postage on first-class mail matter and also on second-class matter. That bill was referred to the committee. So it became necessary for the committee of the Senate to deal with the subject. The Finance Committee, as a whole, I believe, agreed in line with some of the remarks which have been made, that it should not undertake to equalize the postal rates; and I believe it will appear from a consideration of what has been done that the committee has sought to avoid that very thing. Instead of trying to take up the question of postal rates relating to first-class matter and second-class matter and adjusting the differences between the two and trying to make the burden rest where it ought to rest as a matter affecting the interests of the Government, the Finance Committee felt that it ought not to undertake that work at this time and perhaps not at all. So the committee has undertaken to treat this provision in the bill from an entirely different standpoint. We did not feel called upon to adjust the rates on second-class postal matter. We considered that this was a revenue bill pure and simple, and from that point of view the action was taken which appears in this report.

The committee felt that in this time of war we will need all the revenue which can be obtained from various sources without affecting the business interests of the country. We thought that what was done should be done with the steady purpose of not injuring the business interests of this country. We wanted to get the revenue wherever it could be obtained without putting an undue hardship upon any class of individuals or upon any class of business. So it was the purpose to avoid taking up the present system of postal rates and adjusting it, which the Senator from Georgia seems to think the committee has done and for which he criticized the committee so caustically this morning.

The immediate amendment offered by the committee exemplifies the purpose as to this whole measure. The bill as it came from the House put an additional 1-cent tax upon first-class matter except postal cards.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, no.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That was the report of the House committee.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will yield——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator is mistaken. The House itself as well as the House committee not only added 1 cent to letter postage, making the rate 3 cents, but also added 1 cent to postal cards, making the rate on postal cards 2 cents instead of 1 cent. What the Senator's committee did was to knock off the increase on postal cards.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have before me the bill as it came from the House printed in one kind of type, and the bill as amended by the Senate committee printed in italics, and by referring to that I find this to have been the provision of the House bill:

> The rate of postage on all mail matter of the first class, except postal cards, shall be, in addition to the existing rate, 1 cent for each ounce or fraction thereof—

That was the bill as it came from the House; it excepted postal cards.

Mr. HARDWICK. No.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If that is not true, then the print I have before me is erroneous; and I am quite certain that the print which I am reading from is correct. What the Senate committee did was to add to the exemption "private mailing or post cards"; and that was done for a very good reason.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, he does not want the Senate to get a misconception of what has been done,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield further to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator himself has not got it right. If he will go a little farther down the page, he will find that—

Postal cards, and private mailing or post cards when complying with the requirements of existing law, shall be transmitted through the mails at 1 cent each in addition to the existing rate—

So that the Senator utterly misunderstands the situation. The fact is that the House of Representatives did increase the rate on postal cards and post cards just as the Senator from Georgia stated, and the Senator from New Mexico hardly seems to know what his own committee did.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I, of course——

Mr. HARDWICK. I beg the Senator's pardon; I am sorry I said that.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am willing to receive any kind of reprimand which the Senator from Georgia may see fit to offer.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator has suggested that the Senator from Georgia caustically criticized the committee. There is plenty of excuse for it; but I did not intend it in that way, and I am sorry I said that.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will state, Mr. President, that I find the provision increasing the rate on postal cards was made down a little farther, but they were excepted from the provision from which I was reading. At any rate, the point which the Senate committee had in mind was simply the burden which would be put upon the business carried on by that means. Attention was given especially to the question of post cards, and the Senate committee received evidence as to the effect which would be had upon the post-card industry were this additional 1-cent stamp required. It appears, for instance, that upon these cards under the existing regulations it is necessary to print the amount of postage required for mailing in the United States and for mailing outside of the United States; that there are millions of these cards on the market now bearing that statement, and those cards would doubtless be made useless under the postal regulations or the public would be misled as to the amount of postage required.

In addition to that, we found out that in Canada, where the postage has been increased upon postal cards from 1 cent to 2 cents, there has been a falling off to such an extent in the use of the postal card that the revenues were reduced more than the amount of increased revenue which had been expected by the change. So we saw that as a means of raising revenue, increasing that postage by 1 cent would be a failure. That was the purpose of the committee in dealing with this question, namely, to look after the revenue side of it pure and simple, and we did not undertake to deal with postal rates generally and regulate them as citizens might feel they should be regulated.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. What amount of revenue is it calculated the change which the Senate committee has made will raise?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The revenue which the bill is expected to raise from postage in addition to the present revenue is about $50,000,000 on first-class matter, $3,000,000 on second-class matter, and about $7,500,000 from the 5 per cent income tax.

Mr. BORAH. Then the increase on first-class matter will raise about $50,000,000?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. I should like the Senator from Idaho to press his precise inquiry, namely, what amount of revenue is expected to be raised under the Senate committee's amendment.

Mr. BORAH. That is the question I was asking.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Under the Senate committee amendment reducing the postage on postal cards and post cards from 2 cents to 1 cent we expect to leave the matter just where it is now under the present law.

Mr. HARDWICK. How much revenue did the committee figure would be lost from the decrease in the number of letters incident to the increased rate?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The amount that we expect to raise in addition to the present postage on letters is about $50,000,000. The Senator will observe that that is not 50 per cent of the amount which is being derived now from this source, but it was expected that there might be a falling off to some extent in the number of letters going through the mails bearing 3-cent postage. As to how much that will be, only a mere estimate can be given, as the Senator said this morning; there is nobody who can tell how many people are going to write fewer letters because the rate on first-class mail is increased to 3 cents.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield further to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the Senator from New Mexico to say that the Senate committee had no purpose of adjusting the troublesome question of postal rates and so forth, but that they were dealing with it solely for the purpose of getting more revenue.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the committee, in the first place, felt that, inasmuch as this was a bill coming over from the House, it ought not to be changed except in important particulars or where some special injury would be brought about unless a change were made. We dealt with the matter from that standpoint so as to get revenue and at the same time work no serious injury to any particular industry or class.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. I wonder if the Senator's committee ever considered in any way, shape, manner, form, or fashion, or at any time the very interesting and dangerous situation suggested by the Postmaster General that if you make the postage on letters 3 cents and leave the postage on postal cards 1 cent you may lose a tremendous amount of revenue from your letters? Did the committee ever do that?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will state to the Senator that I quite agree to his remarks upon that subject this morning, that the Postmaster General can not tell anything about it; neither can any of the rest of us tell anything about it; and the fact that the Senator from Georgia is trying to make a great deal of it indicates that he has more faith in his judgment on the subject than any of the rest of us have.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me further, I rather inferred from the very able argument of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] that there had been an effort here to deal with what he thought were the iniquities of this entire system; but, as I understand the Senator from New Mexico, in view of the fact that the committee could find no other source from which to draw revenue, it felt the necessity of entering this field for the purpose of revenue rather than for the purpose of straightening out the injustices to the Government, as they may be termed, of the Postal System as it now obtains. If this is merely for the purpose of obtaining revenue, there are some of us who believe that you can get it somewhere else much more justly and more adequately. If it is for the purpose of dealing with the wrongs which have been perpetrated heretofore, as has been suggested, then those of us who are inclined to vote against it would like to know in what particular it straightens out those wrongs.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the view which the Senator from Idaho has just expressed has been expressed by others who have been considering the matter, both on the committee and off it. We have felt that the present system of postal rates, at least from one viewpoint, is radically wrong, and from another perhaps not so very wrong; but we became thoroughly convinced that to try to adjust the postal rates at this time upon the basis of having each class of mail matter pay its own way would disturb the business of the country beyond any point which would call for such action on the part of the Senate.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield, and to whom?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The statement that the Senator has just made clarifies this matter so far as I am concerned. I should not think it would be wise to undertake to deal with and change this system in a revenue bill. Therefore, if we are only dealing with it for the purpose of getting some revenue, knowing myself where we can get some revenue, I shall vote against this proposition.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator has said that the committee in its action desired to change the House provision as little as possible. My understanding is that the House provided that there should be a zone system established, out of which you would get about $20,000,000 a year. Now the Senate committee comes along and changes the system established by the House entirely, and, in addition, reduces the amount of revenue from $19,000,000 to $3,000,000. If it were only on account of securing revenue, why did the committee change the House provision and reduce the amount of revenue from this source from $19,000,000 to $3,000,000?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the Senator doubtless failed to observe another thought which I tried to present, and that was that we also took into consideration the effect upon the business of the country.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator mean the business of the country as a whole or the business of the publishers to whom this bounty is paid? I can understand very easily how to make a change would interfere with the business of these publishers, to whom we now pay about $89,000,000 every year, but I am at a loss to understand how it would affect business generally, and I should like to be enlightened on that subject by the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, we have felt that to affect any line of industry would at least, pro tanto, affect the industry of the country. We have tried not to do anything which would affect any line of industry. The publishing business is certainly one very important line of industry, and we did not feel that it was necessary at this time to impose upon the publishers of the country a burden which would put any of them out of business. We have assumed that they are engaged in a very laudable work. We know that through the newspapers and the periodicals the citizens of the country are kept informed as to conditions throughout the country.

As to the zone system, I have my individual objections to that. I do not believe that is a proper system. But the Finance Committee was dealing with the subject from two points of view—first, the raising of revenue, and, secondly, raising it without any particular injury to business; and we proceeded upon that theory. We thought as to the post mailing-card business that the change proposed would put that industry out of business. Definite statements were made to the committee as to the effect upon that industry of raising the postal rate from 1 to 2 cents; and I think the evidence was conclusive that that industry would be practically destroyed by increasing the postage from 1 to 2 cents.

As to the postal cards, as I remember now, that matter was also discussed. The profit in carrying postal cards is much greater than the profit in carrying sealed letters, and that was one of the reasons advanced as to why the postage on postal cards should not be increased.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do.

Mr. HARDWICK. I should like to have the Senator tell me where he got that information, because I do not agree with that statement, and I do not think the Post Office Department agrees with it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think the statement came from some one connected with the Post Office Department.

Mr. HARDWICK. No, sir.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Of course I meant in proportion to the weight.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh! That is a very different proposition.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should have said that the actual cost of carriage was much less in the case of a postal card, in proportion to the weight, than the cost of carrying letters.

Mr. HARDWICK. In proportion to the weight—yes; that might be. The profit from handling postal cards, though, if the Senator will permit me, is not nearly so great as that from handling letters, taking it as a whole.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will state to the Senator that we were enlightened from time to time with various views upon that question, too, as to what was the cost of handling postal cards and ordinary letters, and so on, and I must say that upon the whole the result of my effort to obtain information upon the subject was decidedly unsatisfactory.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator says that the object of the committee was only to raise revenue. Will the Senator explain why the committee put an additional tax on first-class matter amounting to $50,000,000 a year when that particular class of postal matter was already paying the Government $70,000,000 of profit a year, and put an increase of only $3,000,000 on second-class matter when second-class matter was losing to the Government $89,000,000 a year? If the committee wanted to adjust the rates simply with the idea of raising revenue, why such a discrimination against first-class matter, which is already paying its way, in favor of second-class matter, which is now getting this enormous subsidy from the Government?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the Senator asked a similar question a while ago, and I tried to answer him at that time. I might answer now by referring to my previous answer, but I will do the Senator the courtesy of again stating that the committee had two purposes in view: One, the raising of revenue; the other, raising it without doing serious injury to business. That is just why we are not proposing in this bill to raise any greater sum of money from second-class rates. We had extensive hearings upon that question, and had vast statistics presented to us from the books of the companies themselves, showing just how they would be affected if the postal rates on second-class matter were materially raised, and we concluded that it was best not to approve the system which was presented by the House, and to adopt what has been done here.

When I rose I did not expect to refer to anything except just the matter in section 1100 and the paragraph which is under immediate consideration, the amendment of the committee. Unless there is something further to be said, I see no objection to the roll call proceeding.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the debate thus far on this particular section illustrates what I stated the other day, that this particular tax will be an irritating one, with its revenue very doubtful.

As a member of the committee I opposed the raising of first-class letter postage and the insufficient changes that were made in second-class rates. I think every Senator is perhaps familiar with the fact of the inequalities which exist in our postal rates to-day. Senators and newspaper men and periodical publishers may argue as long as they will, but they can not change the facts, and they are that first-class letter postage is paying far in excess of what it costs the Government to handle it, while second-class mail matter causes a deficit in the Treasury variously estimated at from seventy to one hundred millions.

Personally I like the Senate amendment if we are to adopt the provision at all and think it somewhat improves the House section, because it does cut down the House provision as to postal-card postage, so that people who are obliged to write can still send a postal card without adding an increased burden to the cost of using the mails; but in my judgment, Mr. President, it is all wrong. There are literally thousands of articles in the United States in commerce and trade that could be taxed to bring about the same amount of revenue that is proposed here without producing any apparent injustice or without creating any irritation.

I know it is stated by some—and I have no doubt it is true—that it was the intention of the members of the committee to adjust, in a measure, the inequality in the rates between first and second class mail matter. There could be no other excuse, and there was no other excuse offered, for putting such a tax on the receipts of publishers. It is unjustifiable. Nobody can justify that tax on any just and proper ground unless he says, "Why, we are trying to get even with the newspaper owners and other publishers that are getting a privilege out of the Government." That was the reason it was put on; and yet, let us see what it does.

In addition to all the other taxes which the publishers will have to pay—their excess-profits tax, and so forth—we put this special tax upon their net profits. It is not contended that those profits are generally extraordinarily large or that they were made larger because of the war, but this tax of 5 per cent on net receipts was put there for the purpose of compensating, in a measure, for the privilege which the publishers use; and yet many of the publications that would be taxed do not use the mails at all. Therefore it could not be said that we are getting even with any of those publishers by taxing their net receipts.

On the second-class mail privilege we put an additional charge of one-quarter of a cent a pound. That raises $3,000,000, according to the estimate. We increase first-class letter postage by $50,000,000, and instead of composing the differences between first and second class matter we aggravate them and make them still wider.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the Senator to say that the first-class mail matter is paying the Government for its expense now.

Mr. TOWNSEND. And it puts into the Treasury about $70,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. And upon that the committee would put a tax of $50,000,000?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Fifty million dollars.

Mr. BORAH. And the Senator states that second-class mail matter is causing a deficit to the Government of from seventy to one hundred million dollars?

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. And upon that the committee would put an additional tax of three millions?

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is right.

Mr. BORAH. That seems to be scientific financiering.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I can not go quite as far as the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] in my condemnation of the publishers. I believe that extra burdens are being placed upon them at this time and that they are assuming them. I know that they have rendered great financial service to the country at this time, and have been rendering it up to date without compensation; but this question of adjustment of rates between first and second-class matter should be settled by Congress, and it should be settled by itself, and not under the hollow pretense of trying to adjust matters in this revenue bill. I do not wonder that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] had hard work to justify the action of the committee in reference to this matter. It can not be justified. There is no possible ground upon which you can justify the action of the majority on this bill so far as equalizing postage rates is concerned.

I would rather eliminate all reference to postal matters from this bill. I can not vote for increasing first-class letter postage and for leaving second-class mail rates practically untouched, and I do not know at this time just exactly what the ratio should be. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] is correct when he says that this is a matter which should be settled by the Post Office Committee. I am a member of that committee. We have given great consideration to the question. We tried to adjust it somewhat at the last session of Congress but could not get a majority of the Congress with us; but I am certain now, Mr. President, that this question will be taken up and that it will be settled properly. The first-class mail rate will never be increased, though, in my judgment, because it is practically meeting the expense of the Post Office Department now.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, does the Senator recall the fact that when the effort was made during the past 12 months to reduce first-class postage to normal—that is, to 1 cent, the amount it costs—the defense of the 2-cent rate was that we needed excessive revenue at this time, and we could afford for the present to keep it at 2 cents on the ground of contributing half of the revenue to the general Treasury receipts? The 2-cent rate was retained upon the ground that we needed the revenue?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I remember that argument very well. I remember also the frantic appeals that were made to Senators by publishers who were paying an immense price for paper. Now the price of paper has gone up. I have no doubt that if we were to add materially to the burdens of these publications we would produce a great deal of trouble among them; and, because I do not know just what rate ought to be imposed at this time, I think it is wiser to eliminate from this bill all reference to postal matters and make up the deficit and more from sources that can well afford to pay the expenses of this war.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a minute?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator keeps referring to the fact that the price of print paper has gone up. I want to suggest to him that the fact is that almost every publication in this country has passed that on to the public long ago, and they no longer have it as an excuse for their own pleas.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think that is true to some extent; to what extent I do not know.

Mr. HARDWICK. I shall be able to show.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But I also know that everything else has gone up. If any man engaged in business can tell me truthfully that everything that he uses in the conduct of his business has not gone up, he will present a situation that I did not know existed. Of course everything has gone up.

This extra charge of 5 per cent on the net profits of a newspaper, I repeat, is unjustifiable. If the newspaper business is a legitimate business, which it is, there is no more reason why it should pay this extraordinary tax besides all the other taxes that other enterprises pay than that a similar tax should be placed upon the farmer.

Mr. President, I do not want to delay the vote, and I did not intend to say a word upon this question if the Senate was ready to vote, but I feel as though we ought to understand this situation. The committee can not justify this proposition of raising first-class letter postage to 1 cent more, making it 3 cents, any more than it can justify the tax upon the net profits, which amount to a sales tax upon the net profits of a newspaper publisher. It is insufficient and negligible.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I did not have the pleasure of hearing all of the Senator's argument, but I heard him make the suggestion that he would rather vote to strike out all provisions with reference to postal rates, and place that tax upon something else; and apparently he recognizes the inequalities between the charges on first and the charges on second class matter. Now, as I understand the Senator, he concedes that at present there is a profit on first-class matter and a very large deficit on second-class matter.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator is correct.

Mr. POMERENE. Then why would it not be fair to make some increase on the second-class matter, even if we do not make any increase on the first-class matter, so as to meet in part, at least, this deficit?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think I would vote for that proposition, although I do not know what rate to vote for just at the present time, under present conditions. A quarter of a cent a pound means nothing. I do not think it does more than take a step which may possibly be held hereafter as being the judgment of Congress as to what rates ought permanently to be imposed on second-class mail matter; and inasmuch as it is simply an expedient which does not get us anywhere and does not settle anything, but rather further aggravates the differences between first and second class mail matter, I think it would be the wiser thing for us at this time to eliminate it from the bill. But, I repeat, as I said at the beginning, that I like the Senate amendment in reference to postal cards better than I do the House provision, because it does leave an opening for people to write without being taxed 300 or 400 per cent on the messages that they send.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I quite agree with him about that; but has the Senator thought about what the effect of that may be on the revenues from first-class mail?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Well, this is a guess anyway about this; so, inasmuch as nobody understands it, I think I would take my chances with that kind of a guess rather than the one proposed by the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, almost all of the criticism that has been made this afternoon has been, not upon section 1100, now under consideration, but upon sections 1101 and 1106. When those sections are reached we will take up the reasons why the committee made the changes in those sections. Section 1100 refers only to first-class postage rates.

I want to say, Mr. President, that Canada has advanced her postal rates on account of the war, and Canada has found no reduction whatever in the number of letters that have been written and mailed as a result of the increase of 1 cent in the postage upon letters.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, is the Senator sure he is right about that?

Mr. SMOOT. I am sure that is the testimony that was given to the committee.

Mr. HARDWICK. Not by the Post Office Department.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, we get it directly from the reports from Canada.

Mr. HARDWICK. They have not had any reports from Canada this year.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, all I know is this: It is reported to us that the monthly statements made from Canada have shown that there has been no decrease whatever in the number of letters which have been mailed since the increase of a cent in the postage on letters.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, the Post Office Department hear that the reverse is true, and we would be very much interested in knowing who furnished the Senator that information. You did not have postal people before the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, we did have postal people before the committee. We have had experts from the department there, and I will say to the Senator, if he wants to know it, that it was the experts from the Treasury Department who gave the information to the committee.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Treasury Department?

Mr. SMOOT. From the Treasury Department; yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. All right. I am interested to know that.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say, Mr. President, in behalf of the committee, that this is a temporary bill, and just as soon as the war is over we expect this whole legislation to be repealed. The tax that we are imposing upon first and second class mail matter is not upon the rates, particularly upon the mail matter itself, but it is a tax upon transportation. We are taxing transportation over the railroads, both freight and passenger. This is a transportation tax, Mr. President, pure and simple; and when this law is repealed the present postal rates will not be affected in any way, shape, or form.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I would not be in favor of increasing the first-class postage rates under normal conditions. The Senate knows that I was one of the advocates of a 1-cent postage rate; but I do not believe the people of the United States are going to object to paying 1 cent additional upon a letter that they mail during this war. Why, Mr. President, in many families it will not amount to a cent a month. In others, it will be more. The only complaints that I have ever received have come first and foremost from the publishers of the country. They tell the committee about the amount they pay yearly for the postage on letters that are sent out to their millions of subscribers, and the receipts that are sent to them whenever they pay for advertisements or for the paper or magazine itself. That is one of the reasons why the publishers of the country claim that if we impose a tax upon them by way of an increase in the rate on second-class matter, they will sustain double taxation, because of the fact that they are compelled to pay the increase on first-class matter as well.

I have not received one letter from an individual in the United States protesting against the increase of 1 cent on first-class postage. I believe, Mr. President, there is as much loyalty among the people of the United States as you will find anywhere, and I do not believe they are going to oppose or criticize or object to the imposition of an additional tax of 1 cent upon first-class mail matter.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Is there any more loyalty among that class of people than there is among newspaper owners? The Senator had protests from newspaper owners against requiring them to pay the expense of transmitting their papers.

Mr. SMOOT. I have received protests from nearly all of them, and I may say to the Senator now I shall discuss it when the following section is under consideration. I do not want to take the time of the Senate to-day to discuss it, as it is not before the Senate. I have at least 1,000 statements, sworn to, showing what the farm papers, the religious papers, and other certain classes of magazines made during the year 1916. They are not just the statements of individuals written in the shape of a letter, but they are sworn statements of annual reports showing just what they make. I assure the Senator that he can take all the profits made by all the farm journals in the United States for the year 1916, and if we impose 1 cent additional tax upon the second-class mail there is not a doubt but that it will amount to more than all the profits of all the farm papers in the United States.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to say to the Senator, if that is true I would not in any way cripple the work those journals are doing.

Mr. SMOOT. It is true, and I am sure it would not only cripple them but it would bankrupt most of them.

Mr. VARDAMAN. A great many other journals, though, make enormous profits.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is perfectly correct. I say to the Senator the only justification the committee has for imposing a tax of 5 per cent upon the net incomes of all the publishers of the country with the exception of an exemption of $4,000 was to get at a part of the profits to which the Senator has just referred. We believed that it was possible to take a part of those profits and not destroy the journals, as we know that the imposition of an additional 1 cent a pound would destroy many of them.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I agree most heartily with the Senator. I am glad the Senator has directed his penetrating intellect to discovering the meritorious cases that deserve protection. But we all know there are a great many publications in this country that have made enormous profits and they ought to be made to pay their proportion of the burden of tax that is being levied for raising revenue for conducting the war.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is absolutely correct, and in order to protect the struggling papers of the country the committee gave an exemption of $4,000 to all publications in the United States before imposing the 5 per cent tax. I know the 5 per cent tax upon publications is a special and discriminatory tax. The committee tried to avoid such a tax and did so with the exception mentioned and in two other sections of the bill covering patent medicines, golf balls, baseballs, and articles used in games, on which is imposed a tax upon gross sales of 2 per cent.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has just referred to the sworn financial statements of gentlemen. I do not question their statements, but does the Senator know of any reason why these publishers may not increase their advertising rates and subscription rates the same as anybody else?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator's question is an absolutely proper one, but I want to say to the Senator now I do not want him to get the idea that I do not believe that second-class mail matter should not be increased. I do believe it, but I do say that this is not the proper time for us to impose it in order to secure revenue, the effect of which would be to destroy certain publications. I believe the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads ought to take up the matter and what rates are agreed upon, and I believe the publishers ought to be given time to arrange their business in order that they may meet the changed conditions. For instance, let me call attention to one thing. I know farm papers in this country that have contracts out for five years' subscriptions, and they can not be changed. It is quite usual for such papers to give five years' subscription for the price of three years if paid in advance.

Mr. POMERENE. I recognize that that argument is made, but let me suggest this: The coal operators we have paid some attention to did urge all the while that they had a lot of contracts out at a low rate, and therefore Congress ought not to reduce those rates. The whole thing is illogical. The difficulty, so far as the publishers are concerned, is not different from that of any other problems of taxation we have.

Now, let me make another suggestion. I have been in touch with some of these publishers, and when they come to us they say, "We are making no money at all," and the very next minute they will say, "We will give you all the profits we make, but do not increase our postal rates." It is a most generous disposition.

Mr. SMOOT. We do not have to take the word of the publishers as to what they are making. Fortunately, if we go to the Treasury Department, we can find their report showing their profits for every year since 1909. I want to say to the Senate that all the taxes that have been imposed in this bill have been imposed based upon the rates of incomes and the profits that have been shown by the reports from all the corporations of the country as reported to the Treasury Department each year since 1909.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator talks a good deal about farm papers and religious papers, and that is entirely correct; but the House in legislating on this subject made an exception as to those journals, and the Senate Committee struck out the exception entirely. If the Senator's concern is about the farm and labor and scientific journals, why not treat them as the House did by striking out the exceptions?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as soon as we get to section 1201—that is the House provision which imposes zone rates—I think then is the time for me or some other member of the committee to go into the question as to whether we should at this time impose an increased rate on second-class mail matter. There is a great deal to be said on both sides. You will never find me standing on the floor of the Senate and denying the fact that there is virtually a bounty given to the publishers of the country of $70,000,000 to $80,000,000. I know it, Mr. President, and all the argument in the world can not change that. But the trouble of it is, we have allowed the publications of the country to build up their business on the present postal rates, and it is a very serious thing now to change it over night.

As far as I am concerned, I am ready and willing as a Senator of the United States to take this question up and handle it in a business way and make the changes that we know must be made, but we should give time enough in order that the publication can adjust their business to the changes. A revenue bill temporary in its nature is not the place, in my opinion, for this to be done.

I do not want Senators to get into their minds that this is an increase of postage rates. In fact, Mr. President, I would have preferred to have imposed a tax just the same as they impose it in Canada, for in Canada they require that a war stamp be put upon each letter. They have not changed the postal rates, but they have imposed a war tax in the shape of a stamp, and they are compelled to put it on every letter posted. But when the committee considered the question of expense attached to such a tax and the limited time the law would be in operation we decided that the best way to do was to increase the tax so as to have but one kind of stamp on each letter instead of requiring every person in the United States to put two stamps—a regular stamp and a war stamp—upon a letter. I believe that if the Senate understood the situation they would approve of it, because I do not believe there is going to be very much criticism on the part of the people if we ask each and every person who writes a letter to pay at least 1 cent more for the carriage of that letter.

Mr. President, we have noticed in the press suggestions from all parts of the country that the President of the United States ask the people of the United States to buy a 2-cent postage stamp once a week and when purchased to destroy it, and thus give that much every week toward paying the expenses of the war. It is a thousand times better this way. I thought the parties making such a suggestion did it in the very best of motives and with a patriotic sentiment for our country, but I believe this is much the best way to meet the situation. All then stand upon an equal footing.

Now, Mr. President, in relation to the decrease in the number of letters that will be written if the 3-cent postage stamp is required upon all letters the committee, in estimating that there would be a revenue of $50,000,000 from that source, has taken into consideration the decreased number, because if we did not we would have reported that the revenue from this source would have been $62,000,000. Therefore, instead of saying that the revenue would be $62,000,000, we now say that the revenue will be $50,000,000 over and above what the revenue from that source is to-day.

As far as having postal cards at 1 cent instead of 2, and as far as the 1-cent postal card rate interfering with the 3-cent letter rate, I do not believe that anybody can say what difference, if any, it would make in the revenues, but I doubt whether it is going to make very much difference.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me suggest to the Senator that Canada raised the postage rates on postal cards, too. I think it is necessary to do that everywhere.

Mr. SMOOT. Canada imposed the tax in the way I have stated; but after taking into consideration the immense amount of printing and the extra amount of labor and the trouble it would be to all the people of the United States the committee decided that this was the best way for our country. It is true that Canada increased the rate of postage upon postal cards, and when I say postal cards I mean the department postal cards, the regulation size with no picture upon it, with a limited space upon the back of the card on which a person can write. The post card as understood in this country is what is called the picture card. That is bought all over the United States, or all over the world, and sent through the mails at the 1-cent rate. Now, as to the raising of 1 cent upon those cards as the House provided, I have not any doubt but what we would have lost in revenue at least $10,000,000 on that class of mail matter alone. So the Finance Committee thought that it was not going to interfere particularly if we allowed the postal cards to remain at 1 cent, as under the present law, and also the private printed post cards.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I was called out of the Senate just a moment, and I wish to ask a question, although the Senator may have covered it. Do I understand the Senator to say that he and his colleagues upon the committee have said that you were dealing with this matter solely in the interest of revenue so far as the amendment with reference to postal rates is concerned?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I would not want to go that far, and I do not think the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] went that far. The Senator from New Mexico said they were dealing with it from two standpoints, one as to the amount of revenue and the other as to what effect it would have upon the business of the country.

Mr. BORAH. But it was not your thought or the idea of the committee that you had in any sense disentangled the difficult question of adjusting postal rates.

Mr. SMOOT. No; we know we did not, and as to the second-class mail matter I wish the Senator had been here when I stated my position on it. When the following section is reached I hope the Senator will be present and listen to the position the committee took upon that section. I know, as I have always stated, that the rate to-day can not be justified from a business point of view.

Mr. BORAH. That is, on second-class mail?

Mr. SMOOT. On second-class mail.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly, but you will not remedy it that way.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I have at least a thousand, and I think more, sworn statements from publishers of the United States showing the receipts and disbursements of their companies, sworn to as a true statement of their business for 1916, and I assure the Senator now that if we increase the postal rates on second-class mail matter 1 cent nearly every one of those concerns could not pay the increase out of the gains they have made for 1916.

Mr. BORAH. You have increased it?

Mr. SMOOT. We have increased the rate one-quarter of a cent, and the reason why we imposed a 5 per cent tax upon the net income from publications with an exemption of $4,000 was to reach at least a part of the gains from the publications that are making such vast incomes. That is one reason why the committee imposed that special tax upon publishers and not upon other corporations of the country, and a further reason was to require at least a tax of 5 per cent upon profits as a slight return for the privilege of the low rates imposed upon second-class mail matter. But without going into the postage question, without taking up matters relating to second-class mail matter, I desire to say that it is the only way we could see to reach the publishers making money and relieve those who are not. We take $7,500,000 from those who are able to pay in that way. That is exactly the position of the committee.

I desire to say to the Senator that just as soon as this bill is out of the way I am perfectly willing to remain here and take up the question of second-class mail matter and to thrash it out, and then give the publishers time enough within which to adjust their business to the rates which we shall impose.

Mr. BORAH. How does the committee justify increasing the rate on first-class mail?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that we justify it in this way: It is a tax on transportation. We have taxed all transportation of passengers and freight on all the railroads of the country and of express companies, and this is nothing more nor less than a tax on transportation. As I said before, this bill is a temporary measure; it is to be repealed, I hope, after the war is over.

Mr. BORAH. It is a temporary measure, but it may be permanent in its effect.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think so. I would not vote to-day for an increase on first-class mail matter were it not for war conditions. The Senator knows that only at the last session of Congress I stood upon this floor and advocated the reduction of postage on first-class mail matter to 1 cent. Under ordinary conditions I will say that I am going to do the same thing again.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we ought to do precisely the same thing in these times that we would do in ordinary times. If we can find elsewhere subjects of taxation which ought more justly to be taxed, then we should not impose increased postal rates. If there were no other place where we could go, if there were no other means by which to derive revenue, of course, the argument of the Senator from Utah would be unanswerable; but if there are other places where we can more justly lay the tax and secure its payment more effectively and adequately, I do not see why we should put an increased postage on first-class mail matter when only 60 days ago we were all advocating decreasing it to 1 cent.

Mr. SMOOT. Not 60 days ago, but shortly before we went into the war that was true.

Mr. President, as I said before, I believe that this is a just tax. There has not been a single individual in the United States who has written to me protesting against it. As I said in my opening remarks, the protests which I have received have been mostly from publishers in connection with the second-class mail matter, claiming that they pay a great proportion of the taxes which are received by the Government from the imposition of rates upon first-class mail matter. In fact, I have a statement in my office from one of the great publishing houses of this country showing the number of letters which they send out annually containing statements to their subscribers, the remittances that come from those letters, the number of letters acknowledging the receipt of the money, and also showing the number of letters that are sent out by way of advertising or of calling attention to certain issues and certain articles in the issues. I was surprised to learn how much of the first-class postage is paid by the publishers of this country. I have presented the situation just exactly as it is. I do not believe that the people of the United States are going to object, as I have already stated, to the imposition of the additional 1-cent postage upon letters which they may write. The increased postage will fall mostly upon the business of this country. Therefore if we increase the postage on first-class mail we increase the burden upon them, although I do not call it much of a burden. I do not believe under conditions existing to-day that anybody ought to object to the slight increase. I know they are not doing so in Canada, and I do not believe that our people are going to do it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I hope we may get a vote on this section without very much longer delay. I am not going to make anything like a speech regarding it. I myself do not care whether the committee amendments are agreed to or not, because, after the section is perfected, I propose to submit a motion to strike out all of it except the last proviso which authorizes the free transmission of mail to our soldiers abroad. So I do not think it is matter of very much importance, if the Senate strikes out the section, what we leave in it or whether the committee amendments are agreed to or not.

I desire to say to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] that while my criticisms of the committee were caustic they were not personal, nor have I attempted to impose my own judgment on the Senator from New Mexico or upon anybody else about any matter in relation to this bill. It would have paid the Senator from New Mexico to have learned more about his own bill before he came in here to defend it. One way he could have learned something about his own bill before he came here to defend it would have been at least to have inquired of the officials who are administering the Post Office Department what the possible effect of provisions of this kind would be; but it seems that neither the Senator from New Mexico nor the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] thought it right to find out from the Post Office Department what was happening about postal affairs.

The Senator from Utah comes in with a proposition that he obtained an estimate with relation to postal affairs of Canada from the Treasury officials who, in all human probability, know nothing about it.

Mr. SMOOT. But they think they do.

Mr. HARDWICK. They think they know something about everything, but the Post Office officials do not think they know any too much about post office affairs either in Canada or the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that I do not believe that there was ever a statement made by the Post Office Department upon this question of increase since the revenue bill was introduced in the House but that can be found in the Finance Committee room or that the Finance Committee did not have it before them.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator from Utah is absolutely in error about that, to my certain knowledge.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me finish. The Senator has made the statement that the only time the committee heard from the Post Office Department officials was when they came before the committee advocating the amendment which I had offered at their suggestion.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. Wait a minute. The committee did not go into any of these questions at that hearing. I was there every minute of the time. They threw away every word the department officials said without giving it any serious consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not say that we had a hearing. My statement was that I did not believe that there was a statement that had been made by the Post Office Department in relation to the zone system or in relation to the revenues of the Government as affected by the changes up to that time that had not been submitted to the Finance Committee of the Senate and that the committee had not seen and considered.

Mr. HARDWICK. I doubt if they have ever seen any of them.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, well, of course, that is the Senator's opinion.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am only going on what the Postmaster General himself said. I think he knows fully as much about it as does the Senator from Utah. He says he has not been consulted about this matter except in relation to this one amendment of mine. Now, I want to ask the Senator from Utah this question: When the committee undertook to make a discrepancy between the 3-cent rate on letter postage and the 1-cent rate on post cards—a thing that neither Canada nor any other country has done—did they ask for the opinion of the Postmaster General on that?

Mr. SMOOT. No; as I said before, we did not ask the opinion of the Postmaster General on that point.

Mr. HARDWICK. Did the committee think the Treasury officials could tell them about that?

Mr. SMOOT. The committee did not care anything about what the——

Mr. HARDWICK. Did not care about the effect on the revenues?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will just wait a moment, if he wants an answer.

Mr. HARDWICK. Very well; I am merely trying to get through; that is the reason I am trying to hurry the colloquy along.

Mr. SMOOT. I will not bother the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator from Utah is not bothering the Senator from Georgia. I am very glad to have the Senator interrupt me.

The fact is the committee did not pursue it; they jumped in the dark on that proposition?

Mr. SMOOT. No; we did not.

Mr. HARDWICK. They did not go to the postal authorities to get even an opinion about it; they did not figure how it might affect the postal revenue. According to your own estimate, the $12,000,000 was allowed on account of what might be the possible decrease in the volume of mail. This other thing did not cut any figure at all. But I do not care; you may perfect your proposition as you please. I think myself I shall vote for the 1-cent rate on postal cards and take that chance, because it will be that much to the people of this country, and that much increase at least will not be put on them. If we did not need the revenue too badly, I would undoubtedly favor the committee proposition in this instance; but the whole thing shows how unsatisfactory their dealing with the subject has been. They did not even stop to inquire and did not even attempt to get the information from the postal authorities of this country.

However, that is neither here nor there. I do not care anything about that; I merely mention it to the Senate to show how unsafe it is to follow the committee on matters of this kind. I do not care anything about it personally; I have no feeling about it. I wish the committee had consulted those capable of advising, and I know the Postmaster General feels the same way. I dislike to see a committee come in here with a great title dealing with postal matters when they have not consulted or taken the advice of the Postmaster General or of the department about anything, even matters of administration; and surely in that attitude I do not think they are entitled to be followed blindly by the Senate. That is why I brought out that point and dwelt upon it.

Now, so far as the section under consideration is concerned, I hope the Senate will strike it out. The Senator says that the people will not mind paying as a war contribution 3 cents on first-class mail; but as a war contribution or as something else they are already giving the Government $72,000,000 on this sort of matter, and that is enough and more than enough. The postage rate could have been made 1 cent and still this class of mail matter paid its own way many years ago. Now, when we keep it at 2 cents that is enough as a war contribution without increasing it to 3 cents; that is a greater contribution than anybody else is making, and more than any other similar class of business is assessed. To come here and ask the Senate to add $50,000,000 from this source simply because the people are unorganized and will not protest and are not represented here by committees or lobbyists—and I do not use that in an offensive way—like the newspapers and publishers of all sorts have been, to say that they will not object because that has not been done is a pretty poor way of putting it. I think, perhaps, you will find when you go out among the people that they do object to this sort of thing. If you do it, I think they will ask you in many a State in this Union, "Why did you increase our burden $50,000,000 when we were already paying you $72,000,000 profits, and why, when it came to increasing the burdens on the publishers on whom you are losing some $70,000,000 to $80,000,000 a year, did you increase their rates only $3,000,000?"

However, it is for the Senate to say, and I am willing, Mr. President, we should vote on it. I think the Senate understands it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, as one member of the Committee on Finance, I wish to take about three minutes in giving the reasons why I at least voted in committee for the increase of 1 cent on first-class mail rates. The main reason was this: We needed the $52,000,000—I think that was the estimate—which would be raised. We knew of no method by which we could more easily raise $52,000,000 than by an increase of 1 cent upon first-class mail matter. We know that the American people are not a penny people. Many years ago I read of a Scotchman who asked an Englishman why they coined a piece of money of such insignificant value as a farthing. The Englishman replied that it was so a Scotchman could make a contribution to charitable institutions. [Laughter.] Now, the Americans are not of that class. They can make a contribution to the war purposes of 1 penny upon a letter without squeezing the penny. Labor is now reaping from $4 to $10 per day; business in all lines is upon a high and expensive plane; nobody is counting the farthings; no one is looking seriously at the pennies; the price of two or three cigars will take care of about the average amount involved in the increase of postage to the average family for a year.

The American people are not complaining. The one who is so poor that he can not afford an extra penny for the letter he writes is so everlastingly poor that he does not write any letters; he is not going to be seriously affected; but the persons who will be affected more or less will be institutions like Sears, Roebuck & Co., and I believe that the profits that they are making upon their business are such that they can contribute. They will feel it, of course, but they can make this contribution to the Government without any serious curtailment of their profits.

That was the reason, Mr. President, on my part why I voted for this provision which would allow the people to contribute a little penny in the form of a stamp attached to a letter. It is not much to the individual, but with a hundred million people in the United States there will be quite a considerable sum of money realized.

I appreciate the fact that we could place that tax somewhere else; and those who desire to make the bill as unpopular as possible, who want to pinch business in every way, might properly say that we should relieve the public from it and should put it upon this business or upon that business; but, Mr. President, we ought to tax the business what it will reasonably stand, irrespective of this little tax. If business should be taxed more, if profits should be taxed more than we tax them in the bill, then simply impose upon them a higher tax; and when we get through we will not then have any more money than we need. This little $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 on letter postage will not be felt by the American people. They are not so picayunish that they are going to cease to write letters because it is going to cost a penny more to mail a letter.

The Senator from Tennessee asks why it was we did not raise the amount on second-class matter, which is now being carried at a heavy loss. That is not very difficult to answer, Mr. President. I think it was in the early eighties or the late seventies that we first enacted a law which said to the publishers "We will carry your mail for such and such prices"—prices that would not cover one-fourth the cost of the service. The publishers built up their business on that basis. They have gone on, encouraged by the action of the Government itself; they have put their money into their several lines of literature, enjoying second-class mail rates; some of them are making a scant living; some of them are making enormous profits. Now, will we drive out of business in war times those who are making very scant earnings; those whom we have encouraged by our laws to carry on business under conditions and charges which we said we would make to them? We gave our reasons for our action then; they may not have been very good reasons, and I do not think they were, but the principal reason which we gave was that we wanted the American public to secure the knowledge that would be furnished through these publications. Some of the knowledge obtained is undoubtedly very useful; the usefulness of some of it is very doubtful, indeed; some is good, some is bad; but we can not differentiate between the two. But the farm publications, the religious publications, the trade publications took advantage of that liberal law. I think that law was wrong; and I believe we ought to right it just as soon as we can; but when should we begin. Should it be during war time? Should we strike down to death any business that we can keep going during this war period?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, as I understand the Senator, he is willing to put this increased tax of $50,000,000 that we are to raise on first-class matter in order to give a bounty to these suffering publishers to whom we are now paying a bounty of $80,000,000?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee does not understand the Senator from North Dakota in any such way, and he knows well that he does not understand the Senator from North Dakota in that way. I was not in the Senate when that law was passed, but it is here. It is a condition created by a law of Congress. Businesses have grown up under those conditions. Is this the time to destroy any of them? The Senator may think it is, but I do not think so. I stated before that I believed we should in time get these rates back to a basis on which they will be paying the Government for what they are receiving from the Government, at least the expense of carrying their products, which, in effect, are nothing but merchandise sold in the markets of the country.

I have before me a brief statement concerning a half dozen of the leading farm journals of the United States. I will not mention them, because the matter is confidential; but I notice that the entire net earnings of 1916, according to the sworn statement, are but a little more than one-half of the postage alone paid in 1916. You can, therefore, understand how important a bearing even a slight raise of one-quarter of a cent would have upon their income. If we were to add to this postage 300 per cent, as has been proposed, to raise it to 4 cents, or if we were even to double it, in my opinion it would destroy these journals. Even under the present bill we have added one-fourth of 1 cent; and that one-fourth of 1 cent, added to the postage of those journals, would make the cost of postage a little more than double the amount of profits received for the year 1916.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. For information, let me ask the Senator if it is not true that those papers carry very little advertising?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly; and I am going to touch on that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask that question because the suggestion has been made from the department that our plan of increase would relieve journals of that kind of their burden if we placed it upon the advertising matter carried, and omitted the reading matter.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; they carry a very much smaller percentage of advertising compared with their reading matter, and that is not all. Their subscribers are so distributed that they must use the mail through all of the zones. They have to send their publications from Boston to San Francisco by mail only. Great publications like the Saturday Evening Post can be sent by express or by fast freight to distributing points, and then get the cheaper one-zone rates; but none of these small papers can do so; they must pay the heavier mail rates.

Now, let us consider the answer to a question asked by the Senator from Georgia. He asks why the publishers can not raise their rates of advertising and their subscription prices and thereby be able to meet such an increased rate as would pay the Government the carrying and distributing cost. Here is a sworn statement with reference to a number of these publications:

> To help offset the expected increase in paper cost (which I need not mention here, because we all know that it is great) advertising rates were increased late in 1916; but the volume of advertising has so decreased since then that the advertising receipts for 1917 will be but little, if any, above 1916. That experience in raising advertising rates has shown us beyond the shadow of a doubt that we have already reached the point where the law of diminishing returns becomes a factor, and absolutely shuts out any hope of increased revenue from that source. Also, we have been unable to advance our subscription lists.

I believe that statement to be true.

Suppose we destroy those journals—what follows? Their advertising will go, then, to these greater and more profitable journals. This will add greatly to their weight in advertising matter and to the expense of the Government, and so the Government will still be carrying them at a loss while their profits will be increased by absorption of the business of the others.

Let me give another reason. We wanted to get at these larger concerns without killing the smaller ones. We raised the rate only one-fourth of 1 cent because we felt that probably, with the greatest economy, they might be able to continue their business. We did not believe we would destroy them with an increase of one-quarter of a cent.

How about the others? Would that one-quarter of a cent be a just charge for these journals whose enormous profits have been referred to by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]? We all know that it would not be. Now, how are we going to reach them? You can not reach them by a flat rate on all publications alike. Why? Because while one of these journals might receive $10 for 1-pound weight of advertising, the larger journals would receive $10,000 for a pound weight of such advertising, and thus we would be carrying at a loss for the benefit of those who receive the $10,000 if you put them upon the same basis—a basis by weight—as those who are receiving $10.

We wanted to equalize that if we could, or at least make those larger concerns pay a greater proportion; and how did we do it? We could not charge one of them one rate and another one another rate simply for the carriage; and so, for the privilege—because that is what it amounts to—for the privilege of taking advantage of the low postal rates which are afforded them, compared with what it costs the Government, we taxed them the 5 per cent on their advertising profits.

That may not be enough. It is not; but let us remember that those who are receiving these large profits also pay in other ways. The corporation pays its regular corporation tax. Then the corporation pays an excess profits tax, if it is getting an excess profit. Then, the individual also pays on his stock in the corporation, and if the stock is mostly owned by a few individuals, it pays an extremely heavy income tax. With this tax of 5 per cent upon the net earnings to offset to some extent the losses of the Government, with the extra tax of 6 per cent against the corporation, the excess profits tax, and with the additional income tax running as high as 50 per cent against the individual, it was felt that we are getting as near a just basis as it was possible. For that reason, Mr. President, we adopted the rule which we have reported to the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator will permit me, of course, under the corporation tax, the income tax, and the war-profits tax, all publishers come within the provision of the text of the bill if they meet the requirements financially; but let me call the Senator's attention to this fact: If we take up one of the large publishing concerns and compare the treatment of that publishing concern with the treatment of one of the large manufacturing or business concerns, they all pay these same taxes, but they are required to pay their postal rates; they are required to pay their freights. The Government pays no portion of those freights or the cost of transportation of any of their products. Why should we extend to even the very large publishers this special privilege of paying substantially the greater part of their cost of transportation? It seems to me that in that respect an injustice is done, even if it were defensible on the other ground.

Mr. McCUMBER. The injustice starts from the unjust law which was enacted a good many years ago.

Mr. POMERENE. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. And I can see no way of remedying that at the present time, while we are crossing this war stream, without possibly doing a greater injustice and a greater injury. I agree entirely with the Senator; but let us remember another thing: A great many of these journals, like our great daily papers, while they have the privilege of using the mails at this rate, only use the mails for from 5 to 20 per cent of their business, and many of them do not use the mails at all, but simply send their publications by freight or by express, so that you reach them by taxing them for the privilege, and you get a greater amount out of them than you would get if you fixed a higher rate, even a rate that would pay the expenses of carrying some of them.

On the whole, it seems to me that we have got as nearly a fair proposition as it would be possible to get under the conditions of having to deal with a bad situation created by our own legislative action.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator from Ohio that he need have very little fear about the wealthy publishers making a fair contribution to the income of the Government. I hold in my hand now a letter from the most prominent publisher in the Senator's State, who tells me that his contribution under the laws will be four or five hundred thousand dollars a year to the Government. That is a tremendous sum, and yet it is gathered from small sources, and it responds willingly and glady. But you get them in all the ways which the Senator from North Dakota has described. They can not keep these earnings free from taxation.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator does not meet the objection to this legislation. I have not any doubt but that there are several publishers out there who make very large sums; and I know, or at least I have been informed, of one company that own five or six papers in that State and will be compelled to pay this increased postage if the Congress provides for it, and they want it done. They have said so editorially and through their news columns, because they say they felt it was necessary to enter this war and they were going to do their bit, and they are doing it. I have not any doubt about many of these publishers paying large taxes, big taxes, for which the Senator's committee has provided. They are doing their duty in that respect, and performing it patriotically. But I can not see my way clear to extend privileges of this kind to any set of men on earth, and I do not believe that the publishers ought to ask it. It seems to me that if they could go before the public and say, "We are going to smite graft, we are going to smite extravagance, we are going to smite special privilege every time it sticks up its head," they could come forth with more force if they themselves were in a position where they were not receiving this kind of a privilege.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the Government must be careful that it does not concentrate this power in a few hands. The tendency of this legislation would be decidedly in that direction. Those that are most prosperous would survive and those that were just barely eking out an existence would fail; and at a time like this you can not impose those burdens. These publications not only shape the business but they shape the policy of the Government; they shape the public thought of the country; and it is a dangerous thing to concentrate all of the powers of the journals of the country, so far as our own country is concerned, in a few hands.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not expect to do that; neither do I anticipate the pessimistic results to which the Senator has referred. But every time we place a tax upon anybody we are increasing his burdens; and we are simply asking these men to pay for a part of the service that we are rendering them. I know some very shrewd publishers, some unusually bright business men, who are engaged in publishing splendid papers; and I know that these gentlemen are going to meet any added burden that the Congress may see fit to place upon them, and they are going to do it in one of two ways, or perhaps in two ways—one by increasing their advertising rates and the other by increasing their subscription rates.

I do not anticipate the difficulty which seems to be in the mind of the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I hesitated about voting for this increase in the letter rate, and I have hesitated all along as to whether I should vote for it; but it does not fall to any large extent upon the average man. The great bulk of the letters are sent out by the business houses. The movement we had for 1-cent postage did not come from the average citizen. It came from the big post-office order houses, and was largely organized and engineered by them. We get $50,000,000 out of this item. I do not think the workman or the farmer will find as a rule that it costs him much more than a cent a week. The average number of letters written by him is not much over one a week. The bulk of the revenue will come from the publishers, the business houses, and the professional men.

I have not received a single letter from anybody objecting to it, and it seems that there really is not any objection to it. It will raise $50,000,000. I do not like to impose the tax; I would rather not do it; but, sitting here and reflecting, I hesitate about giving up the $50,000,000 when I have not had a single citizen of the United States write me that he objected to it. I think the bulk of it would not come out of the average citizen, but would be distributed among those who can bear the tax without burden, and they do not seem to object to it, so I have finally concluded to vote to put it in the bill, and take by it the revenue so much needed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not desire to discuss this amendment. I desire to make a suggestion with reference to the procedure. I understand that there is a petition for cloture which Senators are carrying around in their pockets to be presented to the Senate shortly. I hope, Mr. President, that we shall so conduct our business that the cloture will not be presented for the first time in the Senate of the United States just as we are coming on to discuss war profits.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator does he understand that it is to be presented just before we reach war profits?

Mr. BORAH. It can not be presented at any other time unless presented pretty soon. We should dispose of this measure, of course, as hurriedly as we can, but those who have the cloture, which they have a right to present, I think should present it now, so we may at least have a record of the fact that it was not presented for the purpose of cutting off discussion upon the war-profits feature. I should not like to have it recorded that the first time it has ever been possible to make cloture in this body was just as we were entering a discussion of increasing the tax on war profits.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. I think I am safe in saying this afternoon when those who had a petition for the cloture presented themselves to certain Senators, among whom myself, it was stated that there were Senators on this side of the Chamber, Senators on the Democratic side, so called, who desired to enter rather fully into a discussion of the matter of the tax on excess war profits, and that not having been reached, having given way from day to day, it would appear to be unfair to limit their debate. When that was made known, Senators who had presented that petition requested themselves that it be not pressed any further. They had not known that that form of privilege on the part of Senators who had not had their opportunity to speak had been postponed and the privilege would possibly be denied if that cloture were presented.

I assure the Senator that among other reasons why it was suspended in its operation or its circulation was because it was discovered it would tend to do the very thing the Senator from Idaho intimates, in some degree to limit the debate on the question of war profits.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. If the Senator from Idaho will permit an inquiry made by reason of my ignorance of the procedure of the Senate in years gone by, do I understand from the Senator from Idaho that for the first time in the history of the Senate of the United States cloture is to be invoked and applied in the discussion of swollen war profits?

Mr. BORAH. That was the program that I was seeking to avoid. I understand from the Senator from Illinois that it has been avoided.

Mr. LEWIS. I will assure the Senator, having been a party to the proceeding to which I now allude, there was no intention on the part of those circulating the petition for cloture even to effect such a result; and when it was brought to their attention that such might be the result I assure the Senator the matter was no longer pressed at that time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I do not think there were half a dozen names signed to the paper. I saw the paper. I did not sign it. I did not see the name of a member of the committee signed to it. The Senator who had it said that he just thought he would get it up to use when it might be desirable to present it, but he had no idea of presenting it at the present time. I suggested to him that I did not wish to sign it at the present time, because I did not think it should be used until measures were perfected and we knew exactly the issue that was to be voted upon, and until we were sure that some one was using time not for legitimate discussion but for delay. I am sure there was no purpose to press it, and I am sure no member of the committee signed it.

Mr. BORAH. I am delighted to hear that. I am glad I called attention to this matter, because one or two Senators have put in a most industrious day circulating this petition. I am sure this brief discussion will relieve them from further exertion and energy along that line.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I signed the petition and I am a member of the Committee on Finance. I suggested the question of circulating it this morning. Senators can not confuse me nor embarrass me in the least by their peculiar tactics or the unwarranted suggestions they are making to the effect that the efforts to secure a vote are put forth to prevent the discussion of the war-profits provision. They have been discussed. They can yet be discussed an hour by each Senator on this floor even under the cloture rule. Ninety-six hours can be devoted to the discussion of war profits and incomes if Senators wish to discuss them.

Nobody on this floor is more in favor of placing taxes very high on war profits than I am. I assume that no one doubts my position. I have expressed myself clearly to that effect. For Senators to rise here and intimate that there is some disposition to do something irregular in reference to the war-profits proposition is an insult to the honor and integrity of the Senators who suggested that a rule of the Senate requiring a two-thirds vote be invoked to terminate a debate which has been running for about three weeks, and especially after every effort to secure unanimous consent for a vote on some definite date in the future had failed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I proposed the petition and signed it, Mr. President, because I was witnessing what I then believed and what I now believe to be true, namely, the employment of tactics which, whether so intended or not, were daily rendering more doubtful the passage of amendments to the revenue bill which to my mind were of the greatest importance. No Senator has more at heart the desire to amend this measure so as to raise as much larger revenue from incomes and war profits than I have and I resent any inference to the contrary.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Michigan is one of the last Senators in the Senate whom I would charge with any improper motive in reference to anything that he might do, but I call the Senator's attention to the fact, nevertheless, that the war-profits question has not been discussed practically at all, and that it was the only real vital issue left in the bill when this matter was being circulated.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the cloture rule could not possibly interfere with legitimate discussion. The Senator suggests that it was proposed by some to have cloture applied just as we reached the war-profits provision. I do not believe that any Senator thought of such a thing. If that were so, however, 96 hours—4 days—could be devoted to the discussion of war profits, 96 hours without any intervening motion, with no opportunity for delay. No dilatory motion could be entertained under the rule. If Senators wanted to discuss it, they could do so for 96 hours; but, Mr. President, I would like to confine the discussion of the Senate to the matter before it, and if we had this rule in force every Senator who wanted to discuss the bill and amendments could do so, and from the very nature of things discussion would be confined to the bill. Senators would be in their seats and real debate would occur.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. It is true, Mr. President, that we would have 96 hours in which to discuss this question, but it is also true that under this cloture rule it is impossible to deal with the question in the way of amendment and to explain and to discuss the amendments as they come up as you do under the general rule. You are limited to an hour's discussion. If the hour takes place before some vital and important amendment is offered you are absolutely precluded from discussing it.

It was not that I desired to occupy time, but that whatever amendment may be offered at any time upon this war-profits proposition shall have ample discussion before it is passed, and under this cloture rule it will be impossible to do it. I want an opportunity to intelligently take care of each proposition as it is presented. I desire also to have the bill disposed of, but I would like to dispose of it after consideration of each proposition.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Furthermore, Mr. President, there would be opportunity for 48 hours of discussion before the rule could be invoked and 96 hours after that before a vote was had.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that Senators ought to discuss the bill with the idea of reaching the inevitable vote. I do not understand this criticism on the part of alleged friends of higher war-profit taxes. I could understand it better if it had been made by the enemies of an increase. I want to vote on war profits where my vote might count. I want all Senators who have not already discussed this bill to have an opportunity to discuss it. The proposed rule would not deny them that privilege, but I want to have the question settled sometime.

We have been here for months and months and months, and I am willing to stay even longer, if necessary; but I would like to have the Senate proceed to business.

That is my desire, and while I have always opposed a radical cloture rule, still I have felt at times that patience had ceased to be a virtue, and this is one of those times. If the disposition is as has been intimated to me, that we are to run this discussion on for weeks, then I favor fixing a time for terminating it, especially when I feel that necessary amendments are being imperiled by unwarranted delay.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator what indication there has been of any filibuster on this matter?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is not necessarily an open filibuster that is indicated, but I have learned of things elsewhere than on this floor.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator if he signed this proposition under the theory that there was going to be a determination to kill time?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It was to meet such a probability. I signed the petition with the idea that it would be presented whenever there was shown clearly to the Senate a disposition indefinitely to defer action upon the bill. The raising of revenue is imperative. All realize that. I shall vote against the bill unless it is changed materially, and the bulk of the revenue is raised from war profits and incomes, and I believe that there is no good reason why, after six days more of debate, all Senators can not be ready to vote. I propose, as far as I am able, to give them a chance.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, we all know who has charge of this bill, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. We have all listened to his efforts this forenoon to get an agreement to go outside of the rule that we had already adopted to take up the amendments in their order. Those who wish to have a hearing immediately upon the question of war profits, and excess profits, and upon income, heard the Senator in charge of the bill make an attempt to get an agreement to take that up immediately so that we would get at that proposition first. Failing in that he gave notice that as soon as this amendment was disposed of he would ask that we immediately proceed to the consideration of the question of raising revenue from excess war profits.

I think the insinuations that are made upon the floor that the Senator in charge of the bill purposes to use any unfair means are uncalled for. There is not the slightest danger in the world but what the question of revenue from excess profits or incomes will have all the time that any Senator could reasonably ask for.

In the absence of the chairman of the committee I desire to say this for him at this time. He has shown no disposition to be unfair, and if there has been circulated a petition it is to be used only, I understand, in case a filibuster should develop and when it is developed it is very proper to have the club in your hands.

Mr. President, I have voted against every attempt during 18 years to get a cloture rule. I voted against this one. I do not believe in it as a rule. But if there is any time in which debate might justly be shut off it is when the Government is in a war. That is the only time when I would ever be in favor of applying it, and never in any case of applying it in a manner that would be unjust or in a manner that would not give a proper hearing upon every point in a bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I was going to say to the Senator, if this petition has simply been circulated to be kept in its proper place until it is demonstrated that there is a determination to prevent a vote, that is one thing, and that is perfectly satisfactory to me. But it seemed to me a little extraordinary, looking back over the experience of 10 years, that there should be such activity in circulating a petition at a time when there has not been the slightest indication of an effort to kill time. There have not been five minutes occupied on this bill which have not been occupied legitimately in the discussion of the most vital of its features. In view of the fact that there has been no indication, and in view of the fact that this cloture was being advocated by men who I have seen stand on the floor and kill bills by physical endurance, it occurred to me it was time to speak about it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator will find that no injustice will be done by a cloture rule, and he can rest assured that the Senator in charge of the bill will not attempt to take any advantage whatever in the discussion.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I wish to say to the Senator from Idaho that the petition as presented to me had no date in it at all. It was a petition that was prepared to be used in case a filibuster developed on this floor and there was a disposition to prevent a vote at the proper time.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the object that I had in signing the petition and also in assisting in its circulation was simply to get a vote within a resonable time. The House of Representatives passed the bill three months ago. The discussion began on this bill in the Senate on the 8th day of August. On Saturday we adjourned because nobody desired to speak. Are we going to let the time of the Senate be so wasted? My object more than any other is to have a vacation so that we can attend to needed business at home, instead of waiting here between long speeches and roll calls for Senators to come and answer to their names and occasionally vote upon propositions. I believe that the hour discussion of each Senator as provided in the rule or the 15-minute discussion would give more enlightenment on this bill than the various long speeches that have been or will be made. Who listens to them? As a matter of fact, not more than a very few in this Chamber. On an average there are not 10 Senators present during general debate. Is that convincing or coming to a determination? Is that enlightening the Senators who are to vote upon this measure?

Mr. President, if we want an interesting and effective discussion we should limit the length of the speeches, though not exactly as is done in the House of Representatives. I think they devoted five or six days to the consideration of this bill. However, no one said that he was not getting a fair discussion of it in the House. It is true we have a different custom in the Senate; but why should Senators attempt to criticize the invoking of a rule that has been adopted by the Senate? It is as binding a rule as any that is contained in the standing rules of the Senate. How can persons fairly say when a rule is being invoked that there is anything that is of sinister motive in invoking it?

Here is a provision that is not supposed to be in the hands of a few Members. If two-thirds of the Senators are not willing to close this debate, then it will not be closed. It is not going to be closed unless two-thirds believe that it is wise that it should be, after one hour has been given to each Senator to discuss the bill.

Mr. President, it seems to me under these circumstances, in view of the fact that we have had nearly three weeks of debate, inasmuch as we have not made any headway hardly in the consideration of the bill, we must enforce the rule to make Senators realize that we must get away from here before December 1.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I ask for a vote on the pending question.

Mr. STONE. I should like to have the question stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 94, line 7, after the words "except postal cards," the committee proposes to insert "and private mailing or post cards."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, after we have had this enlightening debate on the cloture, it seems to me that we might well pause and listen to a few words of wisdom on the question pending before the Senate.

Mr. President, I have waited long for some one else to discuss the question now pending before the Senate. Since no one else desires to do so, I desire to say a few words regarding the matter. Most of the debate has taken place on another section. The section, in substance, provides that there shall be a tax levied on letters of the first class. I am not particular, Mr. President, whether the Senate committee amendments are agreed to or not, and it is not going to be in order to move to strike the section out until all of the committee amendments to this section and the remainder of the bill have been disposed of.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I think we have an understanding that we are to dispose of that matter now, so that we shall not have to go back to it. I do not say there was an express contract to that effect.

Mr. NORRIS. I am glad there is such an understanding, although that is still another violation of the unanimous-consent agreement which was made some time ago, that we were first to dispose of the committee amendments. An amendment comes up one day and goes down the next, depending on who is in the Chair as to whether it is in order or whether it is out of order. I shall be glad if there shall be somebody in the Chair at that time who will say that that kind of a motion will be in order, so that we may dispose of this question while we have it before us and immediately after it has been debated.

Mr. President, I am opposed to levying a tax on letters. I am opposed to it for several reasons. I would be opposed to it even though we should, in my judgment, get all the revenue that the committee expects to get out of that kind of tax. It is an unjust tax; it is an unfair tax; it is a harassing tax to business. The answer comes that it is only a penny every time you mail a letter; but, Mr. President, we have heard it said over and over again—and with the sentiment I am in entire accord—that we should do nothing to harass business. Then it is said in defense of this proposition of levying a tax of 1 cent on each letter that it will be paid mostly by business. So those who advocate the proposition use the argument in its favor that they condemn in regard to the general subject of levying taxes.

The tax will be largely paid by business men and business institutions, and it will harass them; it will interfere with their customs and their habits; it will interfere with customs that have grown up under the present law. That was one of the arguments used by the Senator from North Dakota why he did not want to increase second-class postage rates now, because under the law men have built up immense business concerns that would be injured if we changed the law. That will be true to a great extent if we adopt the pending provision. I would not object to it entirely on that ground, but I think that is worthy of consideration.

It is said that it is only a penny; that the people of the United States do not care about and will not think of this small contribution, as they make it from their savings. If this were the only harassing tax in this bill, I would not stop to discuss it and I would not so much care about its adoption, but it is not the only penny tax in this bill. The people will not only pay a tax every time they put a 3-cent postage stamp on a letter, but they will pay a tax every time they send a parcel-post package; they will pay another tax every time they send an express package; they will pay another one every time they send a freight package; they will pay more taxes every time they drink a cup of coffee or a cup of tea or a cup of cocoa; they will pay a tax every time they eat anything which contains sugar—all small, all pennies, but in the aggregate amounting to many million dollars.

You may weigh the people down a little at one time and a little more the next time, and still a little more, only a penny each time, but in the aggregate you can crush them.

One Senator said in advocating this kind of amendment that he was opposed to taxing too heavily profits and incomes because it would make the war unpopular. This is another amendment which will make the war unpopular. All these little harassing taxes will do more to make this war unpopular than anything else that we can do. It is not so much the money that is contributed in the shape of pennies as it is the theory of the contribution, the taxpayers knowing that there are other millions which entirely escape.

The time may come in this war, although I hope not, when we ought to levy a tax on letters. In my judgment, it has not yet come. The widow who gives up her son under the law of conscription will not be able to send him a letter, if this proposed law is passed without change, unless she pays a tax; she can not send him a pound of candy as a Christmas present over in France unless she pays a tax for doing it, whether she sends it by mail, by parcel post, by express, or by frieght. Talk about making this war unpopular, Mr. President, this kind of harassing laws will make it unpopular, if anything can do so.

But, Mr. President, while this tax is small, all these taxes put together will mean in many cases the difference between starvation and living in comfortable circumstances. With the cost of living already mounting sky high, going so high that men who a few years ago could even consider themselves living in luxury are now looking the poorhouse in the face, going so high that it is bringing suffering to millions of honest toiling families all over this country, add a penny here and a penny there and another penny somewhere else to everything that people eat, to all their activities, and you will crush them down. There will be such a feeling against this war, engendered by that kind of taxes, if for no other reason, that it will seriously interfere with its prosecution. I protest, Mr. President, against the levying of this kind of tax.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARDING. I am very much impressed by what the Senator from Nebraska is saying, and I am not sure that I may not have to change my attitude toward this bill if the statement which the Senator has just made can be well substantiated. I am not seeking to cast any reflection upon the Senator's argument, but I want him to specify and to point out the corroboration of the statement just made, to the effect that thousands of men in this country, who were heretofore living comfortably, are stared in the face by the necessity of going to the almshouse.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, I know dozens of them, and there will be many more of them this winter, who heretofore never thought of such a thing, who will suffer from hunger and cold unless conditions materially change. I tell you there are thousands of families—millions of families, I believe—in this country to-day who will suffer before spring from hunger and cold unless relief comes.

Mr. HARDING. Will the Senator name a specific instance?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator desires a specific instance. I do not want to refer to things personal, but I know personally a good many instances, and I am going to tell the Senator of one.

Mrs. Norris a few weeks ago went into one of the stores of the Dutch Market Co. in this city to buy some groceries. The Senator from Ohio, I presume, knows what the Dutch Market Co. is. It has a chain of stores over the city of Washington, where it is believed, by some, at least, that they can purchase goods a little bit cheaper because, for one reason, they make no deliveries; you have to carry your goods away and they save that expense and claim to be able to sell cheaper thereby, and I have no doubt they do. So far as I have been able to determine, all the stores are very efficiently managed and operated by very good business men on good business principles. They trust no one; they sell for cash. Hence they lose nothing in that way. There may be other reasons which they claim as an advantage for trade with them, but those are a few of them.

Mrs. Norris was in one of those stores with a basket on her arm buying a few groceries. She asked for 10 pounds of sugar and bought it. There was standing by her side another woman, well dressed, intelligent, nice-looking, who, when she saw her purchase 10 pounds of sugar, exclaimed that she wished she could buy 10 pounds of sugar. She said, "How can you afford, how can you get money enough at one time, to buy 10 pounds of sugar and have the cash for it all at once? Look in my basket; there are 2 pounds of sugar—all I can buy at a time." There were several other small packages of other groceries which she had purchased. She then said, "My husband gets $1,600 a year; he has had from $1,200 up to that for a number of years. We were saving some money, not so much as we would have saved if we had known these hard times were coming on; but we have five children, all of them small, and we are never able now to buy 10 pounds of sugar at once. If my husband were to get sick, if one of our children should get sick, I do not know what we would do." Their ability to live within their means depended upon the entire family—husband, wife, and children—maintaining their health. She continued, "If my husband should lose his position, if some of the children should get sick, we would have to have support from the public in order to get through this winter. I do not know how we are going to buy shoes for all the children; I can not buy 10 pounds of sugar at once; 2 pounds are my limit."

Mr. President, that woman is only an illustration of thousands and millions of others who are a great deal worse off than she and her family are.

I know of another instance of a family living in my vicinity in the city of Washington who, I was told not long ago by my neighbor, would require help in order to get through the winter, although the husband is getting $100 a month.

Mr. HARDING. Well, Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARDING. I will not undertake to ask if the Senator inquired into the economic life of that family, but I want to say to him in passing that if a family which is now earning $1,600 a year is threatened with resort to the poorhouse, then there must be in the United States of America no less than 5,000,000 families threatened in the same way, because it is notorious that until we had the raise in wage incident to the activities of war times the average earnings of the workingman throughout the United States was less than $600 a year. In elaborating on the instance, which is more or less pathetic, I grant, the Senator overlooks the fact that the visit of death in any home dependent upon a bread winner necessarily brings distress and anxiety to the family; it is not peculiar to war.

Mr. NORRIS. No; the visit of death always brings distress; but how many men under ordinary circumstances, with a family of five children and a wife, would not be able, so far as finances are concerned, to take care of any ordinary case of sickness in his family? How many men would there be who when they got sick would not have something that they had accumulated in the past on which to live? But when a man is using every cent that he can earn to support himself and his family I do not wonder that the wife is terrified at the thought, when she can not buy more than 2 pounds of sugar at once, that sickness may come into her home, as it is likely to come anywhere. In the case to which I have referred the wife knew that every one of those children had to have shoes; she knew that it cost 100 per cent more to clothe them so that they might go in respectability to the public schools and get the education that it is so desirable every child should have, and she knew that sickness, which, as I have said, is likely to visit any man or any man's family, was likely to visit hers; in fact, it would be much out of the ordinary run of things if any one family should entirely escape it.

Mr. President, the Senator says that probably I did not inquire as to the economic mode of life of that family. I confess that I did not; I did not need to; the picture to me was too plain without any further inquiry. I myself support a family; I know something about the cost of living in Washington; and, Mr. President, I have wondered how thousands of people live, how they can live in this city on the salaries they receive, and support families even on an ordinary scale. I could give a number of instances more pointed than the one I have given, if I desired to. I will say to the Senator from Ohio; some that have come close to me, but I do not care to disclose them. I had supposed that the condition referred to was something of which we all had general knowledge. We know that men of family with salaries that a few years ago would have been considered luxurious have staring right in their faces the open door of the poorhouse in case sickness comes into their families or crosses their threshold.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield again to the Senator.

Mr. HARDING. I think the Senator has overlooked the point I was trying to make. I wanted to suggest to him that if the pathetic incident which he cites is based on an income of $1,600 a year, then this country is menaced with the most horrifying condition that any tongue can relate.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska, as corroborating what he has said, to the report of the committee appointed on April 26 by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and I should like to read just a little, if the Senator will permit me, from that report.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. KENYON. The committee says:

Interesting figures were obtained from the proprietors of some of the smaller stores, whose business is with the poorer people. They show clearly that the poor have been compelled to resort to the strictest economy in order to provide food on account of high prices. Their purchases are of the cheapest possible articles and in smaller quantities than heretofore. The sale of ordinary cuts of meat in this class of stores seems to have been discontinued, and the meat now purchased consists of hog livers, hog kidneys, neck bones, hog faces—

And so forth.

That is one of the methods to which the poor have been compelled to resort to get along in this city.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska further yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARDING. Since the Senator from Iowa has been good enough to bring that into the discussion, I want to ask him if he thinks that is a new situation in the world?

Mr. KENYON. It is not a new situation, unfortunately. I am afraid it is a situation that is growing more serious in this country.

Mr. HARDING. If I may trespass further on the time of the Senator from Nebraska——

Mr. NORRIS. All right.

Mr. HARDING. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa how he would expect to relieve that situation with a minimum price on wheat of $2 a bushel?

Mr. KENYON. I do not know that that would relieve the situation. I do not think it will relieve the situation to impose any further taxes on these people, either.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I submit that the question the Senator from Ohio has asked the Senator from Iowa has not any bearing upon this question of levying a tax of 1 cent on letters; but what the Senator from Iowa read from the report, an official document, is, it seems to me, a demonstration of what I have been contending for.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment I will yield. I want first to answer a little further a suggestion made by my friend from Ohio.

The Senator from Ohio says that if the incident I have given is true—and I only gave it after the question had been asked me whether I would not give something specific to corroborate what I have said; I would not have given it otherwise—then we are presented in this country with a horrible situation.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment. Wait until I get through answering this argument, and then I will yield to everybody. But what the Senator from Iowa has read is a corroboration not only of what I have said but a corroboration of what the Senator from Ohio intimated was true, that if this incident had any value we are confronted with a horrible situation. I believe, Mr. President, that the entire country in this high-cost-of-living proposition is confronted with one of the most difficult situations that was ever presented to our people or any other people. It is a difficult situation and one that is hard to solve. We must meet it. We only make it worse when we add pennies that we require that the poor, already overburdened, shall pay to support the Government of the United States.

Now I yield. I think first I ought to yield to the Senator from New Mexico, who rose first.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I just wanted to say to the Senator that it is very much desired that we have a short executive session this evening before the Senate adjourns, and I wish to ask the Senator if he will yield for a motion to go into executive session?

Mr. NORRIS. I will do that as soon as I yield to the Senator from Minnesota, who desired to interrupt me.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, this seems to be a sort of discussion analogous to what they call a free-conference prayer meeting in the Methodist Church. I want to give the Senator from Nebraska a little of my experience. I am so old that I can remember when we had to pay 5 cents postage on a letter, and in those days I was glad to get work at 25 cents a day. I have survived that postage and survived those wages.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, Mr. President; the Senator from Minnesota has survived a good many things that the people of the present day, perhaps, will not be able to survive. I presume most of us who are as old as the Senator from Minnesota have had similar experiences; and as one of the Senators who is probably older than the Senator from Minnesota I can say, if it is a class meeting, as the Senator suggests, that I have worked for 25 cents a day and 50 cents a day, and I thought I had a good deal better time than I am having now in the Senate. Probably I did. Maybe I ought to have kept at it, and probably I made a mistake when I quit. But, Mr. President, that is not any reason why we should say to the poor people of this country, "We tax you 1 cent every time you send a letter. We tax you another penny every time you take a teaspoonful of sugar, every time you drink a cup of coffee, every time you drink tea or cocoa." We are levying taxes in pennies upon the countless poor of the country already overburdened.

It is useless to discuss the cause of it. We all know that that is true. They are overburdened. No man can successfully deny it. The cost of living when the Senator from Minnesota was young, and away back further yet when I was young, was nothing like it is now.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. I want to call his attention to the excessive taxes put on tobacco. To the common laboring man and to the soldier who serves in our Army tobacco is not a luxury. I read this morning, I think, that Gen. Pershing hoped that our soldiers in France would get an abundance of tobacco. What has the Senator to say on that subject? Nine-tenths of our hard-working laboring men use tobacco, and yet this bill imposes an awful tax upon tobacco. The postal tax is a mere bagatelle in comparison with it. I hope he will make some argument in favor of the tobacco chewers and the tobacco smokers.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, when we get to the tobacco smokers and the tobacco chewers I will discuss that subject. We are talking now about a tax on first-class mail matter. The poor widow can not send a package of tobacco to her son who has been drafted and taken from her support over into the trenches of Europe, if this bill goes through, without paying a tax on that tobacco; and she can not escape the tax by sending it by freight, either. She will pay the tax just the same by express or by parcel post, or in any other way.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator if he wants to make a motion to go into executive session.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I wish to offer an amendment to the pending bill and ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask the Senator to withhold his motion long enough to enable me to offer an amendment, in order that it may be printed, with accompanying tables explanatory of the amendment.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I withhold the motion for that purpose.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask that the amendment and the tables be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will not the Senator have the tables printed in bill form also, along with the amendment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should be glad to have that done, but I have found objection to that request under the rules.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Wisconsin will be complied with.

The amendment and accompanying tables are as follows:

Strike out section 2 of the bill and insert:

SEC. 2. That in addition to the additional tax imposed by subdivision (b) of section 1 of such act of September 8, 1916, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a like additional tax upon the income of every individual received in the calendar year 1917 and every calendar year thereafter, as follows:

One-half of 1 per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $5,000 and does not exceed $6,000.

One per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $6,000 and does not exceed $7,000.

One and one-half per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $7,000 and does not exceed $8,000.

Two per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $8,000 and does not exceed $9,000.

Two and one-half per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $9,000 and does not exceed $10,000.

Three per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $10,000 and does not exceed $11,000.

Three and one-half per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $11,000 and does not exceed $12,000.

Four per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $12,000 and does not exceed $13,000.

Four and one-half per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $13,000 and does not exceed $14,000.

PETITIONS.

Mr. FLETCHER. I present a petition signed by a large number of citizens of Tampa, Fla., which I ask to have printed in the RECORD without the signatures.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TAMPA, FLA., August 14, 1917.

To our honorable representatives at Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: Whereas, upon investigation, we find that there are 1,300,000 aliens in our country who are subjects of belligerent nations now at war with the central powers;

And whereas the administrators of our country have seen fit to declare war against the same said powers and have just passed a bill in Congress calling to arms men in this United States of America between the ages of 18 and 45, either as volunteers or by the selective-draft plan;

And whereas we find that these aliens, who are enjoying all the privileges and hospitalities of this our native country, for whose principles we are sending our sons to a foreign land to fight;

And whereas the United States Government has opened the doors of enlistment to these aliens and they have not responded, but in some instances declared themselves not willing to fight with our armies and done all in their power to dodge the law compelling them to register for examination;

And whereas the same foreign lands that we are willing to fight for is the native home and country of these 1,300,000 subjects;

And whereas we find that there is a bill pending in Congress that would cover this ground:

Therefore we, as the parents and friends and loved ones to be left behind at home, do humbly beseech, beg, and pray that you, as our representatives at Washington, would use all of your influence and power in the House, the Senate, and with our honorable President to see that such a bill shall pass, or some action be taken that will compel these aliens to either take up arms and go to the front shoulder to shoulder with us or return to their native country and serve under the flag whose protection they claim.

J. F. SHEROUSE
(And 2,759 others).

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Los Angeles, Cal., praying that less publicity be given to the activities of the I. W. W., etc., which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m., Monday, August 27, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, August 28, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, August 28, 1917.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, August 15, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

THE I. W. W. MENACE.

Mr. ASHURST. I have received telegrams in relation to the I. W. W.'s, and I ask unanimous consent that they may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read them.

The Secretary read the telegrams, as follows:

GLOBE, ARIZ., August 27, 1917.

Hon. H. F. ASHURST,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We indorse resolution adopted by Industrial Peace League, of Jerome, Ariz., viz, that the Government intern all I. W. W. and other anti-Government propagandists and place them on construction work during the war. A large body in this district meet daily and prevent men from working; are a danger and a menace to the State.

J. WARREN YOUNG,
Chairman Democratic Central Committee, Globe.
R. G. BARCLAY,
Mayor City of Globe.
GEO. R. HILL,
Chairman Loyalty League of America.
F. F. TOWLE,
President Globe Chamber of Commerce.

PRESCOTT, ARIZ., August 27, 1917.

United States Senator HENRY F. ASHURST,
Washington, D. C.:

Yavapai County Chamber of Commerce and city of Prescott indorse resolution adopted by Industrial Peace League, of Jerome, asking Government to detain all "Wobblies" and other radical anti-Government propagandists during war on Army and other construction work.

YAVAPAI COUNTY CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
F. L. HAWORTH,
President, City of Prescott.
W. H. TIMORHOFF,
Mayor.

WAR WITH GERMANY.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I desire to have printed in the RECORD a signed editorial and a report of a speech by Hon. William J. Bryan. The sentiment expressed is so genuinely patriotic, so thoroughly American, and breathes in such a splendid way the real spirit of devotion to our country it should be given as wide publicity as possible.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ABUSING FREE SPEECH.

Before our Nation enters a war it is perfectly proper to discuss the wisdom of going to war, but the discussion is closed when Congress acts. After that no one should be permitted to cloak attacks upon his Government or aid to the enemy under the claim that he is exercising freedom of speech. No sympathy, therefore, will be wasted upon those who have been arrested for unpatriotic utterances. They abuse free speech. And this applies to attacks on the allies as well as to attacks upon the United States. We can no more allow our allies to be crushed than we can afford to be crushed ourselves. The defeat of our allies would throw the whole burden of the war upon us. We must stand together and fight it through. There are only two sides to a war—every American must be on the side of the United States.

W. J. BRYAN.

FIGHT KAISER HARD, MR. BRYAN URGES—GERMANY'S OVERTHROW ONLY WAY TO END WAR, HE SAYS.

CHICAGO, August 27.

William Jennings Bryan, in Chicago for a chautauqua address, declared to-day that peace can come only through the overthrow of Germany.

"My idea is that any dissension among us as to the prosecution of the war," said Bryan, "will have a tendency to prolong it and make it more costly in money and men. The more anyone favors peace, the more loyally he should support the Government as the only means of hastening peace.

"There can be but one end to the war—that is the overthrow of Germany. I find the desire to support the Government practically universal.

"We shall, of course, win the war whether Russia is able to hold her position or not. Any end except in our favor is inconceivable. If Russia is overwhelmed, we shall merely have a new situation to cope with. But I have great faith in the ability of Kerensky.

"I am very glad Congress conferred on the President as broad powers as it did. There is no fear of their being abused. I would even have had the law go further and empower the President to protect the people from the greed of any group that tried to take advantage of them along any line.

"There is more danger that taxes on war profits of big business will be too low than that they will be too high."

THE DRAFT LAW.

Mr. VARDAMAN presented a petition signed by over 900 citizens of Webster and adjoining counties in the State of Mississippi, praying for the repeal of the conscription law and asking that the question of draft and conscription be submitted to the qualified electors of the several States, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BRADY:

A bill (S. 2821) making an appropriation for the purchase, training, and maintenance of dogs for military purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 2822) granting an increase of pension to John L. Harvey; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LEWIS:

A bill (S. 2823) granting the consent of Congress to the city of Elgin, Ill., to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Fox River at Elgin; to the Committee on Commerce.

WAR REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment is the amendment of the committee on page 94, line 7.

Mr. BRADY. I present an amendment to the pending bill which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	McNary	Simmons
Brady	James	Martin	Smith, Mich.
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	Myers	Smoot
Colt	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nelson	Sterling
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Swanson
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Page	Vardaman
Dillingham	Kellogg	Penrose	Watson
Fernald	Kenyon	Ransdell	Weeks
Gerry	La Follette	Robinson	Williams
Gronna	Lodge	Saulsbury
Hale	McCumber	Sheppard

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. NORRIS, Mr. SHAFROTH, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, and Mr. WADSWORTH answered to their names when called.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, Mr. BECKHAM, Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. HUSTING, Mr. KENDRICK, and Mr. KIRBY entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. My colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] has been delayed on account of official business.

Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. SHIELDS, Mr. WOLCOTT, Mr. KING, Mr. HARDING, and Mr. BANKHEAD entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. KING. I desire to announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] are detained from the Senate on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I ask that the pending amendment be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state it.

The SECRETARY. On page 94, line 7, after the words "postal cards," insert "and private mailing or post cards."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 94, line 8, to strike out the words "ten days after the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 94, to strike out lines 12, 13, 14, and 15 and insert "the same as under existing law: And provided further, That letters written and mailed by soldiers and sailors assigned to duty in a foreign country engaged in the present war may be mailed free of postage, subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Postmaster General," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the rate of postage on drop letters of the first class shall be the same as under existing law: And provided further, That letters written and mailed by soldiers and sailors assigned to duty in a foreign country engaged in the present war may be mailed free of postage, subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Postmaster General.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HARDWICK. After action upon the section by the Senate by the adoption or rejection of the committee amendments will it be in order to submit a substitute for the whole?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would think that under the agreement to take up committee amendments amendments by individual Senators of that character would under Rule XVIII, I think it is, come up as regular amendments later. That is the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. HARDWICK. I mean immediately after the committee amendments have been disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that that was done the other day. The Chair would like to have the Senate agree as to what course it will pursue.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me submit the question, if the Chair please. I think it is eminently proper that it shall be done, because it was not the spirit of our agreement that we should merely adopt the committee amendments as they are presented and have no right to substitute another proposal on the same subject matter for the committee proposal at that time. I think that was the spirit of the agreement, and that is the usual practice. I ask that it be followed, unless the Senator in charge of the bill takes the opposite view.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I concur in the view of the Senator from Georgia. It seems to me that while we have this matter up we might just as well dispose of it now as later. I shall therefore interpose no objection to the Senator from Georgia offering a substitute to strike out, and he may take any such course as he may choose regarding the section after the committee amendments have been acted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it might be well to state that with the understanding that that is the unanimous-consent agreement of the Senate as to the procedure. He will entertain a motion of this character, although the Chair is not sure that it is in order under the previous agreement.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the Senate would give unanimous consent to dispose of the subject at this time and that would relieve us from any possible embarrassment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will entertain it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask that unanimous consent be given to my colleague to offer his substitute to strike out, so that we can now dispose of the question finally.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not think I shall have any objection to that request, but I wish to understand the matter. I understand the Senator from Georgia desires to offer a substitute. I wish the Senator would couple with his amendment—I do not know what the Senator's substitute is——

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, so that the Senate may understand it——

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to add a request that the unanimous-consent request include the offering of a motion to strike out the section.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is exactly the substitute I offer, except I want to leave in the provision about the mail of soldiers and sailors in foreign countries.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That was my request for unanimous consent—that the motion to strike out may be made now and that we may get rid of the whole subject while it is fresh in our minds.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection.

Mr. McKELLAR. That will be entirely satisfactory to me, provided a motion to strike out and substitute the zone system may be made.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We are not on that paragraph now.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thought that the agreement applied to the whole matter.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; just to this section.

Mr. WEEKS. I suggest that there be read what the Senator from Georgia has proposed.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let us agree as to the last committee amendment. I made my inquiry before we had agreed to the last amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. WEEKS. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. I offer the following amendment, in the nature of a substitute, which the Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY. Substitute for the amendment proposed by the committee section 1200 of the House bill. Strike out all after the text of the House bill and in lieu thereof insert the following:

SEC. 1100. That all letters written and mailed by soldiers and sailors assigned to duty in a foreign country engaged in the present war may be mailed free of postage, subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Postmaster General.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, debate on this question, I take it, is practically exhausted.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask the Senator a question. As the amendment was read, I understood it to strike out all after the House text.

Mr. HARDWICK. The House text includes the 3-cent postage-stamp tax. Therefore we must strike out——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me explain it to the Senator. The House text proposes to increase postage on first-class mail matter to 3 cents and the Senate committee amendment proposes to do the same thing with minor modifications, the modification being that the Senate committee proposes 1-cent postal cards instead of a 2-cent postal card, as suggested by the House of Representatives. Now, obviously the only motion that will bring this question to a direct test and issue in the Senate is a motion to strike out this provision from the bill, and in order to do that it is necessary not only to offer a substitute for the amendment proposed by the Senate committee, because even if that were done the House text would be left; but I ask to substitute for the text of the House bill my amendment, which proposes to strike out the text of the House bill as modified by the amendment proposed by the Senate committee and in lieu thereof to insert the substitute.

Mr. NORRIS. I think I understand that, and I want to call the Senator's attention——

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not yield to the Senator just now. Let me finish the sentence without interruption, and then I will yield to the Senator as often and as long as he pleases.

The proposal I have submitted is to strike out the House text as amended by the Senate with the exception of the provision contained in the last proviso relating to mail of soldiers and sailors of the United States while in foreign service. So if my amendment should be voted up by the Senate then the Senate will have determined that it will not increase the postal rates on first-class mail matter from which we are already receiving from sixty to eighty million dollars a year. That is the sole issue. If the Senate wants to impose a tax and increase the burden on this class of mail matter, then if it votes down the substute I have offered that will be the effect of it.

I accept one modification which has been suggested to me, to strike out all of the text of section 1200 of the House bill as amended and in lieu thereof insert——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me suggest to the Senator that he add the word "marine" after sailors.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; I think that is a good suggestion. I ask that that modification be made.

Mr. LODGE. That ought to be in.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is just as well to fix it right by saying "soldiers, sailors, and marines."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, as a member of the committee, I think I would agree with the Senator from Georgia as to what his proposed substitute does. Those who are opposed to raising $50,000,000 more by an increase of 1 cent on first-class postage will vote for it. Those who are ready to raise that additional sum will vote against it. If it is voted down, then we will adopt the committee substitute, no doubt, without further debate, and on that then we could vote without the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARDWICK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the explanation made by the Senator from Georgia of what his proposed amendment will do is perfectly satisfactory provided the amendment will do that. I was trying to interrupt him to say to him that, as I understood the reading by the Secretary, it would not do anything of that kind. I now ask for the reading of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment in full.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of the text of section 1200 of the House bill as amended——

Mr. NORRIS. That is all right, Mr. President.

Mr. PENROSE and others. Question!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been called for.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. Does not the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] strike out the final proviso of the section?

Mr. HARDWICK. No; it does not. I except that.

Mr. NELSON. The motion of the Senator from Georgia should be to strike out all of the section except the final proviso. The Senator ought to put it in that form and then we would all understand it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I understand it, and the Senate does. It is in the exact form in which I desire it. It leaves the language of the proviso in the bill.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator's motion should be to strike out all down to and including the word "further," in line 16, and the remainder of the section should remain.

Mr. HARDWICK. The amendment as framed and proposed by the Senator from Georgia covers the point raised by the Senator from Minnesota.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays are called for.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, it seems to me that it may be advisable to have a division of this question as to whether we——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will suspend a moment because of the confusion in the Chamber. [A pause.] The Senator will proceed.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I was going to suggest a division of the question, Mr. President, but after reflection I do not believe that I shall do so. Just let the vote come upon the motion of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

The junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] has a pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. By an arrangement the Senator from Wyoming will stand paired with the Senator from Montana, and the Senator from New Jersey and I will be at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who is necessarily absent on account of illness. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. I notice that he has not voted, so I withhold my vote.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] to the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], which by an arrangement with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] I transfer to the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], but I will transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. BECKHAM (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not.

Mr. BECKHAM. I have a general pair with him, and in his absence I will withdraw my vote.

Mr. GERRY (after having voted in the negative). I inquire if the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not.

Mr. GERRY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York, which I transfer to the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. STONE. I wish to say that my colleague [Mr. REED] is absent from the city on important business which makes it necessary for him to be away. He will be absent probably for two or three days. I ask that this statement may stand during his absence.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]; and

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 29, as follows:

YEAS—39.

Ashurst	Gronna	La Follette	Sheppard
Bankhead	Harding	McKellar	Shields
Borah	Hardwick	McNary	Smith, Mich.
Brady	Hitchcock	New	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	Husting	Norris	Sterling
Colt	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Thompson
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Page	Townsend
Curtis	Kenyon	Poindexter	Underwood
Fernald	King	Ransdell	Vardaman
Gore	Kirby	Shafroth

NAYS—29.

Broussard	Kendrick	Robinson	Wadsworth
Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Saulsbury	Watson
Gerry	McCumber	Sherman	Weeks
Hale	Martin	Simmons	Williams
James	Myers	Smith, Ga.	Wolcott
Johnson, S. Dak.	Nelson	Smoot
Jones, N. Mex.	Penrose	Stone
Kellogg	Pomerene	Swanson

NOT VOTING—28.

Beckham	France	McLean	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Gallinger	Newlands	Sutherland
Calder	Goff	Owen	Thomas
Cummins	Hollis	Phelan	Tillman
Dillingham	Hughes	Pittman	Trammell
Fall	Knox	Reed	Walsh
Fletcher	Lewis	Smith, Ariz.	Warren

So Mr. HARDWICK's amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment as amended is agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, at this time I desire to reserve the right to have a separate vote in the Senate on this amendment to the amendment. I may ask for it and I may not; it will all depend upon what action the Senate takes on the other items under this title.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah says he may reserve it or he may not.

Mr. SMOOT. I stated that I would ask for a separate vote on the amendment, and I do reserve that right.

Mr. STONE. I also desire to reserve it.

Mr. SMOOT. I did reserve that right, I will say to the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the next amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 94, after line 20, to strike out:

SEC. 1201. That on and after July 1, 1917, the zone system applicable to parcel post shall apply to mail matter of the second class, and (a) from that date until November 1, 1917, the rate of postage shall be as follows, except as hereinafter provided: One and one-sixth cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the first zone, 1⅙ cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the second or third zone, 1⅔ cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the fourth or fifth zone, 2 cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the sixth zone, 2⅓ cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the seventh zone, and 2⅔ cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the eighth zone, and (b) from November 1, 1917, until March 1, 1918, the rate of postage shall be as follows, except as hereinafter provided: One and one-third cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the first zone, 1⅔ cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the second or third zone, 2⅓ cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the fourth or fifth zone, 3 cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the sixth zone, 3⅔ cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the seventh zone, and 4⅓ cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the eighth zone, and (c) after March 1, 1918, the rate of postage shall be as follows, except as hereinafter provided: One and one-half cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the first zone, 2 cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the second or third zone, 3 cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the fourth or fifth zone, 4 cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the sixth zone, 5 cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the seventh zone, and 6 cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the eighth zone.

And to insert:

SEC. 1101. That on and after 30 days after the enactment of this act the rate of postage on all mail matter of the second class shall be, in addition to the existing rate, one-fourth of a cent per pound or fraction thereof.

Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. WEEKS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. In lieu of the words proposed to be inserted by the Senate committee amendment I move the amendment I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the words proposed to be inserted by the Senate committee it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 1101. That on and after July 31, 1917, all newspapers, magazines, and other publications regularly admitted to the mails as matter of the second class when mailed by the publisher shall hereafter be subject to the following rates of postage, the zone system now applying to parcel-post matter to be adapted also to second-class matter:

Local, first, second, and third zones (under 300 miles), 1 cent per pound.
Fourth zone (300 to 600 miles), 2 cents per pound.
Fifth zone (600 to 1,000 miles), 3 cents per pound.
Sixth zone (1,000 to 1,400 miles), 4 cents per pound.
Seventh zone (1,400 to 1,800 miles), 5 cents per pound.
Eighth zone (over 1,800 miles), 6 cents per pound.

Provided, That free-in-county circulation provided by law shall continue as at present: And provided further, That the Postmaster General may hereafter require publishers to separate or "make up" to zones or in such manner as may be directed all matter of the second class when offered for mailing.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to strike out the words "July thirty-first" and insert the words "September thirtieth" in lieu thereof.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has a right to perfect his amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest to the Senator he better make it later than that, because this bill probably will not be a law by September 30.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I suggest to the Senator that he make it December 1.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will make it October 31.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, there are now four propositions before the Senate on the subject of second-class mail—five in a sense—but four——

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me that I may offer my proposed amendment and have it read?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. I offer the amendment I send to the desk as a substitute for section 1101.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. HARDWICK. May it be read for the information of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the request of the Senator from Georgia the Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 96, it is proposed to strike out section 1101 as reported by the Senate committee and insert the following:

That the rates of postage on publications entered as second-class matter, including sample copies to the extent of 10 per cent of the weight of copies mailed to subscribers during the calendar year, when sent by the publisher thereof from the office of publication, or when sent by a news agent to actual subscribers thereto, or to other news agents for the purpose of sale until June 30, 1918, shall be 1 cent a pound or fraction thereof for the portion of the publication devoted to reading matter other than advertising, and 2 cents a pound or fraction thereof for the portion devoted to advertising; and beginning July 1, 1918, and until June 30, 1919, the rate of postage shall be 1 cent a pound or fraction thereof for the portion devoted to reading matter other than advertising, and 4 cents a pound or fraction thereof for the portion devoted to advertising; and beginning July 1, 1919, and until June 30, 1920, the rate of postage shall be 1 cent a pound or fraction thereof for the portion devoted to reading matter other than advertising and 6 cents a pound or fraction thereof for the portion devoted to advertising; and beginning July 1, 1920, and thereafter, the rate of postage shall be 1 cent a pound or fraction thereof for the portion devoted to reading matter other than advertising and 8 cents a pound or fraction thereof for the portion devoted to advertising: Provided, That the rate on copies deposited in a letter-carrier office for delivery by its carriers and the free-in-county circulation and rates on copies mailed within the county of publication shall continue as now provided by law: Provided further, That the Postmaster General may hereafter require publishers to separate or make up in such manner as he may direct all matter of the second class when offered for mailing.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts has been recognized. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I desire to present eight amendments to the war profits tax provision of the bill and request that they be printed and lie on the table, and also that they be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that action is ordered.

The amendments referred to are as follows:

Amendment No. 1: Amend by striking out all of page 12 after the parenthesis in line 13, all of page 13 down to and including line 22, and insert after the parenthesis in line 13, page 12, the words "76 per cent upon war profits (determined as hereinafter provided)."

Amendment No. 2: Amend by striking out all of page 12 after the parenthesis in line 13, all of page 13 down to and including line 22, and insert after the parenthesis in line 13, page 12, the words "72 per cent upon war profits (determined as hereinafter provided)."

Amendment No. 3: Amend by striking out all of page 12 after the parenthesis in line 13, all of page 13 down to and including line 22, and insert after the parenthesis in line 13, page 12, the words "68 per cent upon war profits (determined as hereinafter provided)."

Amendment No. 4: Amend by striking out all of page 12 after the parenthesis in line 13, all of page 13 down to and including line 22, and insert after the parenthesis in line 13, page 12, the words "64 per cent upon war profits (determined as hereinafter provided)."

Amendment No. 5: Amend by striking out all of page 12 after the parenthesis in line 13, all of page 13 down to and including line 22, and insert after the parenthesis in line 13, page 12, the words "60 per cent upon war profits (determined as hereinafter provided)."

Amendment No. 6: Amend by striking out all of page 12 after the parenthesis in line 13, all of page 13 down to and including line 22, and insert after the parenthesis in line 13, page 12, the words "56 per cent upon war profits (determined as hereinafter provided)."

Amendment No. 7: Amend by striking out all of page 12 after the parenthesis in line 13, all of page 13 down to and including line 22, and insert after the parenthesis in line 13, page 12, the words "52 per cent upon war profits (determined as hereinafter provided)."

Amendment No. 8: Amend by striking out all of page 12 after the parenthesis in line 13, all of page 13 down to and including line 22, and insert after the parenthesis in line 13, page 12, the words "48 per cent upon war profits (determined as hereinafter provided)."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The amendment offered by the committee was before the Senate, and now two separate substitutes have been offered for it. I should like to inquire what is the question before the Senate for immediate consideration?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I desire to bring to the attention of the Senate the different propositions which are now before us relating to second-class mail. The first is the House provision, which is the zone system in effect; the second is the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], which provides for taxing advertising; the third is the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], which is a modification of the zone system proposed in the bill as it passed the House and as it came to the Senate; the fourth is the Senate Finance Committee provisions in lieu of these different amendments and of the House provision, which in effect raises the second-class mail pay one-quarter of a cent a pound, and levies a special tax of 5 per cent on incomes of more than $4,000 a year on any second-class publication.

Mr. President, all of these propositions are based on the supposition that second-class mail is being carried by the Government at less than it costs the Government, and that supposition is true. Nobody denies that the Government has from the very beginning carried second-class mail for less than cost; but I want here to bring to the attention of the Senate this fact:

If the Government has been and is carrying second-class mail for less than cost, whose fault is it? Congress established the rates and Congress has maintained the rates up to this time. It is not the fault of any other body or any other set of men. At this time, the most inopportune time which could be found, we propose to punish—not to tax—the producers of second-class mail by imposing unusual burdens on them. Both of these taxes which are proposed by the Senate committee and all of these amendments, including the House proposition, are taxes in addition to what would be paid by any other business men doing any other kind of business in the United States.

The President has said and everyone else has said, I presume every Senator has said to himself, if not to others, "We must levy this burdensome taxation in such a way that it will do as little harm as possible to the person or partnership or corporation taxed." Yet we are levying these special taxes against a business which is notoriously unprofitable at this time—so unprofitable that the publisher of the paper Editor and Publisher, which is really, I suppose, an organ of all papers and publications in the United States, states over his signature in a recent number that he believes that if the net returns of all publications in the United States could be amalgamated they would show a deficit for this year of $10,000,000.

I think, taking the statements which I have here, some of which I am going to submit to the Senate, they will be evidence to Senators that, generally speaking, newspapers and other publications are not making money under present conditions. They have had to meet the ordinary increases in cost which come from the ordinary processes of business, an increase in labor, an increase in everything which they have to buy; but their main raw material is white paper. The white-paper market has been extremely irregular and has advanced by leaps and bounds until, as I shall try to demonstrate later on, the average publication is not making any money even under the conditions of to-day; and if we tax them more, as is proposed by these different propositions, we shall be simply adding a burden which must inevitably destroy more or less publications.

If we have meant what we have said, if the President and his administration have meant what they have said, if Congress has meant what it has said, that it did not wish in any sense to injure any publication by these taxes which are to be imposed, here is a place where we may well stop and not act as is proposed simply because we assume that the Government is carrying this product for less than it cost.

Very much has been said on that subject in this debate, Mr. President, so I want to refer to it very briefly. It has been stated so many times by so many people that the Government is losing from $80,000,000 to $90,000,000 annually on second-class mail that most people have come to the conclusion that that is correct. It is a ridiculously high figure. In the first place two commissions in recent years have investigated this subject; one in 1907, I think, known as the Penrose-Overstreet Commission, and one in 1911, known as the Hughes Commission. By the first of these, the Penrose-Overstreet Commission, it was recommended that the second-class rate should be increased to about 3 cents a pound. The Hughes Commission stated in 1911 that it cost the Government five and a half cents a pound to carry this mail; or, in other words, that there was at that time a loss to the Government of probably about $45,000,000 annually.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Senator refers to "this mail." Does he mean second-class mail?

Mr. WEEKS. All second-class mail.

But, Mr. President, the Hughes Commission made its figures basing them on the weighings of 1906, 1907, and 1908. We weigh one-quarter of the country every year for mail purposes, and at the end of 4 years we commence and weigh the first quarter again, and then the second and third and fourth quarters.

They used the figures of 1907; but when those figures were correct, when they would have applied properly to this problem, we had not applied the so-called divisor, which made a difference of one-seventh in the weight of mail or in the cost of carrying the mail. We had not commenced to carry mail bags—which were substantially one-half of the weight of the mail in the old times—by freight, greatly reducing the cost by so doing. We had not made very many other changes which were of the greatest importance in the cost of carrying the mails. Therefore, if the Hughes Commission had used, or had had available for use, up-to-date figures, instead of finding that there had been a loss of some $45,000,000, or that it cost 5½ cents a pound instead of 9 cents a pound, as the department has so frequently said and as has been so often repeated, we would have a very much less loss to the Government than these figures indicate.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. Before the Senator gets away from the point he has just been discussing, do I understand him to concede that the cost to the Government of carrying second-class mail is 5½ cents a pound?

Mr. WEEKS. That is what the Hughes Commission reported.

Mr. POMERENE. Is the Senator willing to accept that figure?

Mr. WEEKS. I am not willing to accept even so high a figure as that.

Mr. POMERENE. What estimate would the Senator place on the cost?

Mr. WEEKS. I should have to take the up-to-date weighings, the present method of carrying the mail, including the blue-tag system, the carrying of mail bags by freight, and all of the modern changes which have been made—when I say "modern," I mean within 10 years—and apply those things to the conditions as they exist to-day.

Mr. POMERENE. Taking into consideration all of those elements, what would the Senator suggest was the proper cost to the Government?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I do not think I would want to make a suggestion. It might be 3 cents a pound, or it might be 4 cents a pound. But let me call this fact to the attention of the Senator:

The Post Office Department reports to Congress that it carried the parcel post last year for less than 3 cents a pound. The weight of the parcel-post packages is greater than the second-class price weight, about twice as great, and it is carried about twice as far as the average second-class package; and yet the Post Office Department says it made a profit of something like a quarter of a cent a pound, and that the actual cost of carrying the parcel post was less than 3 cents a pound.

Mr. POMERENE. Then, if I understand the Senator correctly, in his judgment the cost to the Government is 3 or 4 cents a pound, and we only get 1 cent a pound.

Mr. WEEKS. Probably that is correct.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may ask the Senator one further question, he has referred to the increased cost of white paper and other materials which the publishers purchase; and I think that is conceded by everybody. Every manufacturer, every business man, has the same problem to meet. There is a constant rise in the cost of materials, but he meets that by an increase in the price of his finished product. Does the Senator know of any reason why the publisher may not increase his subscription price or his advertising prices?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I am not a publisher; I have had no experience in the business; but I think that is a very easy question to answer. The Senator from Ohio must know that in the first place there are a large number of contracts outstanding. Most publications, or very many publications, are subscribed for by the year. There may be a great proportion of those subscriptions that have nine months or a year to run. Then, again, the changing of a method of doing business—not the changing of a price, but the changing of a method of doing business—is completely upsetting to most businesses, and nothing is more delicate than the subscription to a second-class periodical of any kind. If a newspaper doubles its price, naturally the number of its subscriptions will fall off. That immediately affects its advertising; and I think there have been statements made by large newspapers that they have tried increasing the price of their papers and found such a falling off in the number of subscribers that it affected their advertising rates, and it was necessary for them to go back to the old rate. I think there are some papers that have increased their price, and I think where it can be done that should be done to meet conditions as they prevail; but you can not change contracts which are entered into, as advertising contracts and annual subscriptions are entered into, until the end of the contract; and, moreover, no business with which the Senator is familiar has had imposed on it such an increase in the cost of its raw material as has the press of the country.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, in the hearings before the committee we had statements made as to quite a number of papers that had increased their prices. This was to meet the increase in the cost of white paper. I am at a loss to understand why they can change their rates in order to meet the cost of paper and can not change their rates in order to meet at least a substantial part of the cost of transportation by the Federal Government. If there is a distinction, I should like to know what it is.

Mr. WEEKS. There is a distinction, which I will point out.

Mr. POMERENE. And again—if I may ask the Senator another question, and then I will not interrupt him further—there is not a tariff or a revenue measure of any kind that has ever come before the Senate when we have not met the question of the effect it was going to have on the industry.

Mr. WEEKS. That is true.

Mr. POMERENE. Now, I am not able to differentiate between the one class of business and the other; and if there is a distinction, I should like to have it pointed out.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio has very strong prejudices on this proposition, but if he will be good enough to listen to me I will try to point out the distinction.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I might retort that the Senator from Massachusetts has very strong prejudices upon the subject. I have some pretty positive convictions, but I am open to conviction if I am wrong.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I admit very freely that the rate which the Government obtains from second-class periodicals is less than the cost to the Government. While I was a Member of the other body and chairman of the Post Office Committee my committee was engaged in a long investigation of this subject.

Conditions at that time were such that we could not make a change in the rate, although we tried to do it. I am in favor of doing it in normal times; but will the Senator from Ohio tell me any reason why, when a great business—for the publication business is a great business, employing nearly a million people—is struggling to keep its head above water and we are saying that we do not want to injure any business, we should impose unusual and additional burdens on that particular industry more than on other industries?

Mr. POMERENE. Why, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts further yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I am quite ready to answer that question. Granting the Senator's premises, I agree with his conclusion; but I do not grant his premises. I do not think any industry of any kind has any right to ask for a pension at the hands of the Government when we are struggling in all directions to get the necessary money to pay the expenses of the Government. I do not see any reason why we should discriminate. The taxes which we are raising here to-day are a burden upon every taxpayer; but I confess that I do not understand why the newspapers and the magazines may not meet this contingency by increasing their rates of advertising and subscription. I dare say that the advertisers and the subscribers who will complain because the publishers are required to pay a part of the cost of transporting their mail are vastly in the minority. I dare say that most of the readers and most of the advertisers at this particular time are ready now to say to the Government, "We want these prices increased. We do not expect the Government to render us this service gratis, or for a very small part of the cost."

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio is entirely wrong in that supposition. I think a great many publishers are saying that when their raw material returns to normal prices and conditions in the business have become normal they will be glad to take up the question of second-class rates and adjust the rates to the requirements of the Government; but, Mr. President, this is not the time to do it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator just one more question?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has been in Congress longer than I have. Does the Senator know of a time when this same fight was not made?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes, Mr. President, I do. At the time of which I spoke a few moments ago, I think an adjustment could have been obtained if there had been an agreement between the Senate and the House and between the publishers of different kinds of periodicals. It is a difficult thing to reach an agreement which will do justice to one and not do a gross injustice to another. The character of publication is such that a rate which would apply to one class of publications would not apply at all to another; it would be ruinous to the other.

I think I know, Mr. President, that every publisher has been, as far as he has been able to do, raising his advertising rates and possibly raising his subscription rates to meet the additional cost of print paper, which is a very great burden without any question, and if they raise their rates any further they would lose enough subscribers to offset the difference between what they would obtain and what they are obtaining now.

As a matter of fact, Mr. President, to return once more for a moment to the proposition of the cost, the department figures it at 9 cents a pound. There are 1,200,000,000 pounds of second-class mail matter carried at 9 cents a pound. That would be $108,000,000. That is the cost which the department figures. But will anybody tell me how you can figure 9 cents a pound on second-class matter and 3 cents a pound for the parcel post? Of course that proposition is perfectly ridiculous.

Generally speaking, Mr. President, I want to say that I have not found the department figures so reliable that they could be depended on in matters of this kind. The department, for example, figured 10 years ago, when the Hughes commission used its figures as a basis, that the cost of carrying and delivering a pound of first-class matter was 50 cents, of second-class matter 9 cents, of third-class matter 14 cents, of fourth-class matter 12 cents, of franked matter 11 cents, of penalty matter 12 cents, and of foreign matter 11 cents. If these prices were applied to the mail which we carried last year we would have received something like $680,000,000. As a matter of fact, we received $306,000,000, if my figures are correct. It shows that that basis, even if it were accurate in 1907, is most inaccurate to-day.

Now, there is one other point that I want to raise in connection with this particular part of the subject. Who gets the benefit of this low second-class rate, Mr. President? Does anybody know of more than a limited number of papers or periodicals that make large returns on the capital invested? Once in a while there is one. A representative of the New York Times testified before the Finance Committee that the New York Times made $700,000 last year, but that the New York Times, without any increase of its second-class rates at all, simply on account of the increase in the cost of its print paper, would pay $900,000 more for its print paper this year than the last; in other words, if other things were equal, that the New York Times would lose $200,000 this year where it made $700,000 last year. That has been reputed to be one of the most profitable newspapers in the United States.

Mr. President, I believe any Senator within the sound of my voice can count on his fingers the number of periodicals that he personally knows about which are unusually prosperous even in normal times or which will pay as large a return on the actual investment as is paid on most kinds of manufacturing business.

That being the case, I want to call attention to the fact that very many of the publications are a kind of periodical with which most men are not familiar. They apply to church matters, to school matters, to trade matters, and to everything relating to trade. It is only the particular people connected with those trades who have to do with periodicals of that kind. In many cases, as I will be able to demonstrate, such periodicals have practically made no net returns on the investment. They are in a sense mutual between the members of the organization which they serve and the publishers themselves. I assume, of course, that those employed by the publications are receiving proper salaries for their services.

If that is true, let us take a farmers' paper. I will indicate two or three instances of a farmers' paper where no substantial net returns are made, although they are only paying 1 cent a pound for carrying their product. Who is getting the benefit of any subsidy which may be paid? It is the farmers of the country, of course; and if we raise that rate we are going to pass along the raise to those who purchase the paper. Either their subscriptions will fall off or else the farmer is going to pay the difference in the cost, because there is no net profit in many of these instances.

That applies as well to church periodicals and to school periodicals and to trade periodicals as it will to farmers' papers. There are some of these farmers' papers that have a very wide circulation. Several hundred thousand copies are distributed every week or every month at 1 cent a pound. I will give you the figures to demonstrate the fact that there is substantially under normal conditions no net returns on that kind of publication. So instead of giving a subsidy to the publishers, as is in everybody's mind, we are giving the subsidy to the user of that particular periodical, and the user of that periodical is using it for the purpose of developing his own business. It makes a better farmer of the farmer; it makes a better workman of the workman or a better churchman of the church member. It makes a better educated person of everybody who uses the educational press. There is where the subsidy goes, and it does not go to the profit of those who are engaged in the business of producing and distributing this product.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Is it the purpose of the Senator from Massachusetts to discuss the amendment which is proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] on the zone proposition?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, if I were a publisher I should say that the House proposition as it came to the Senate was the worst of them. I should say that the proposition proposed by the Senator from Tennessee was next; that the one proposed by the Senator from Georgia was next; and that the one reported from the Senate committee was the best of the lot. But I would say, "A plague on all your houses," because you are not fair; you are imposing this rate because you say, and you are responsible for it, that I am receiving something from the Government for which I am not paying full compensation. It is unfair taxation, all forms of it. I will later discuss briefly the other proposition, but let me take up the zone proposition now.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator mean to say that it is unfair to make these gentlemen who receive the Government service pay just what that service is worth, or even just a part of it?

Mr. WEEKS. I say it is unfair at this time, Mr. President. I say here is a business employing hundreds of millions of capital, employing substantially a million people, that has been built up on this basis, and this basis was established by Congress. If it had not been built up on this basis that would be a different proposition, but to take it after we have encouraged these men to put their time and money into these enterprises, and to take it at a time when they are straining every nerve to keep their heads above water, and say now we will make you pay what it costs the Government, or nearly what it costs the Government, is, I say, unfair.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Is the Senator's objection not against the principle involved but as to the time when the change is to be made? In other words, if these papers are to be required to pay the Government a fair compensation for the service which the Government renders them the Senate does not deny that they ought to pay it, but now is not the time to impose it upon them.

Mr. WEEKS. That is exactly the proposition that I make; and, Mr. President, I will go further than that. When this war is over and we get back to normal conditions I will be the first, or among the first, to try to readjust these rates so that gradually the Government may receive a commensurate return.

Mr. VARDAMAN. What would the Senator say if every other industry in this country would come forward and say, "You ought not to tax me, because I have built up this industry under normal conditions; if you tax me, you throw the whole business out of gear"?

Mr. WEEKS. That is an entirely different matter. Other industries have been built up on their own basis. Congress has not fixed the price at which their products shall be transported or what they shall pay for their products or anything connected with their business. They have been built up under the conditions which surrounded them. This business has been built up under these conditions determined by Congress.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to say that I would oppose levying a tax upon these people that will disorganize them and embarrass their business. For certain publications I think that would be unfortunate, such as educational journals and farm journals and publications of that character. I think they do a great patriotic and altruistic work. But I do think where an enterprise is making money it ought to give a part of the proceeds of its business to the Government.

Mr. WEEKS. These publishers are going to pay exactly the same taxes that every other business pays. They are not exempted from any taxation. If they are making money, they pay it in the form of an income tax or a corporation tax or whatever taxes are imposed.

Mr. VARDAMAN. There is no business in the world that has the privilege of shipping its goods by rail for less than what it costs the railroads to carry them.

Mr. WEEKS. That is true.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That is an advantage which other enterprises do not enjoy.

Mr. WEEKS. That is all very true, and that applies to another branch of the Postal Service, too. It is estimated by the Post Office Department that we receive from the Rural Delivery Service some $10,000,000, and it cost $50,000,000 to conduct that service. I will ask the Senator from Mississippi, or any other Senator, would he be in favor of increasing the rate five times on that part of the mail which is carried to rural districts under these conditions in order to make that part of the service profitable?

Mr. McKELLAR. If I may answer the question, I will say to the Senator very frankly that I think it is the duty of the Government; and, so far as I am concerned, I will vote for any measure that will bring about any part of the Postal Service paying its own way. That is the only honest, it is the only straight, it is the only fair, it is the only just way to arrange these rates.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Further I want to say that in the main I agree with the Senator from Tennessee, but if there is to be a favor extended to any class of people, the people mentioned by the Senator from Massachusetts are those who are entitled to it, because after all they pay the bills in the last analysis of the whole business.

Mr. WEEKS. Now, Mr. President, let me bring to the attention of the Senate some of the results from an application of the zone system. I have not figured these out as they would be affected by the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee, but by the House proposition. Here are five agricultural papers. Of course these are all going into the rural districts and are carried by the Rural Delivery Service. The Northwest Farmer, published in Minneapolis, the Southern Farmer, published in Atlanta, the Orange Judd Farmer, published in Chicago, the American Agriculturist, published in New York, the New England Homestead, published in Springfield, Mass. If to the House rates imposed by the proposition which comes to the Senate the zone system were applied to those five publications they would pay $224,602 for their second-class mail privileges. They paid, as a matter of fact, last year one-fourth of that, or a little less than a fourth, $53,476. All these papers combined showed a deficit in the year 1916 of $12,451. Their increased cost in paper for this year over last year will be $83,478. If the House rates were applied to those five periodicals, showing as they did a deficit of $12,000 last year, and they had to pay the House rate, those five newspapers, all of which are farmers' papers, would show a deficit this year of $236,000, even if there were no increase in the cost of print paper or other cost.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator understands that in the amendment offered by me, for the first three zones of 300 miles there is no increase upon the present rate, and that probably 80 to 85 per cent of the papers just mentioned by the Senator will circulate within 300 miles, where there is no increase at all in the rate.

Mr. WEEKS. That is one point, but to my mind this is one of the worst features in the proposition that has been made by the Senator from Tennessee. What we should do is to build up a national press. If we are going to build up anything, or if our laws are going to tend to build up any kind of a press, let it be a national press rather than a local press. We all know, every one of us who comes to the Congress, how much men are influenced by their local surroundings, how frequently they degenerate into local attorneys representing their own particular district or State, and how little they know about the requirements of the rest of the country. Is it not an object to us to try to build up a national press which will have a national distribution, which will go to all parts of the country, and is not that in accord with the fundamental conditions under which our whole postal system has been built up?

We carry letters to the remotest section of Alaska, where it costs probably two or three dollars to deliver a letter, with a 2-cent stamp on it, because we have said that every American citizen shall receive the same benefit and privilege which every other American citizen has as far as it applies to the mails. And now if we were going to apply the zone system under any conditions it would simply mean the moving of newspapers into the center of the zone distribution in the first place, and, in the second place, we would tend to localize that great press which is national to-day, not the daily newspaper, not newspapers generally speaking, but all other forms of publications.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, under the present system, which is a flat-rate system, has not the precise thing been done that the Senator says ought not to have been built up? In other words, is it not true that under the present flat-rate system no daily newspaper circulates when it is sent outside of the zone of 300 miles of which it is the center. With just a few exceptions, I believe it has been estimated that about ninety-odd per cent of our great daily papers—there may be excepted two or three in New York City—circulate within a zone of 300 miles, and that has been built up under the present flat-rate system. So I do not think the zone system would interfere with that in the slightest.

Mr. WEEKS. I will agree as far as the daily press is concerned that that is very largely true, but I will not agree as far as other classes of publication are concerned. In fact, I think it is distinctly the reverse. I think I have the figures here indicating the very wide distribution of certain classes of papers, like the Christian Herald and the Youth's Companion, and papers of that class. They go to every section of the country, and certainly one great daily newspaper does, the Christian Science Monitor, which has one of its largest subscription lists in the State of California, and it is published in Boston. I think if the Senator will investigate he will find that outside of the newspaper press, generally speaking, the circulation is very wide outside of a single zone.

Now, I want to bring to the attention of the Senate a statement made by some 86 newspapers, because I am afraid it will not be brought to the attention of the Senate if it is not done in this way.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. SHIELDS. Before the Senator takes up that class of papers——

Mr. WEEKS. What I am discussing now relates to the zone system.

Mr. SHIELDS. I so understood, but the Senator was giving us some information concerning agricultural papers, and my question is directed to that. Has the Senator any information as to the subscription price of the agricultural papers he mentioned?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think I have that here.

Mr. SHIELDS. It was stated here yesterday by a Senator who is evidently very familiar with the subject that most of those papers really have no subscription. that they are furnished along with other papers for some 20 or 25 cents a year, and that the real object of circulating them is the advertising based on that circulation, and really that is the business of the publishers, and not the educational matter of the farmer. Has the Senator examined that feature of it?

Mr. WEEKS. I think, Mr. President, there are a few such cases, which, in my judgment, are extremely reprehensible. There are not many, but there are a few of them. That, however, does not include the papers to which I have referred and papers of that class.

There are 86 of these periodicals which have made a statement, which has been examined by Price, Waterhouse & Co., who are well-known accountants, so that we may depend upon its accuracy. The average circulation of these 86 papers in 1916 was 21,264,404. The total amount of postage paid by them at 1 cent a pound was $1,243,465. The amount of postage which they would have to pay under the zone system under the terms of the House bill would be $4,959,376. The total net profits of all these 86 publications last year were $1,197,403. So if the House provision of this bill became a law, even if there were no increase in the cost of manufacture and the cost of white paper, there would be a loss to those 86 periodicals of $3,034,566. Now, if we add the proposition of the Senate committee of one-quarter of 1 cent, with the increase in the cost of print paper, those 86 periodicals would show a very large net loss for the year.

Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. HARDWICK addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want again to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the figures which he has just mentioned are based upon the House bill, which is very different, as the Senator, of course, understands, from the amendment offered by me.

Mr. WEEKS. I do understand that; and the Senator from Tennessee will remember that I said that his proposition was better than the House provision, and I also said of the proposition of the Senator from Georgia that I thought it was better than either of them.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Massachusetts, but still I do not want to be diverted from the immediate question I intended to ask. Of course, the unfortunate thing about it all is that the Senator, notwithstanding that statement, insists that he is against both propositions.

Mr. WEEKS. I am.

Mr. HARDWICK. But, Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator this question: Does not the Senator think that these publications of every character have practically passed on to the public, and generally to the advertising public, the cost of print paper about which they now complain so much?

Mr. WEEKS. No; I think it is universal testimony of newspaper men that so far as possible they have passed it on, but they have had to do so very gradually; and they have reached the point where they can not do it any further.

Mr. HARDWICK. I hope the Senator will not complain about that any further, because I think I can show that at the present moment that gradual process has reached its climax. They are no longer paying this amount that they claim is such a burden to them.

Mr. WEEKS. I hope the Senator from Georgia can show that, but I am not confident that he can.

Mr. President, to my mind the worst feature in the proposition which has been submitted by the Senator from Georgia arises from the fact that it will make one class of publications pay for the transportation of other classes. That is true to a certain extent of the transportation of all publications.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will it bother the Senator from Massachusetts if I ask him a question or two along that line, because the Post Office Department is earnestly trying to get a solution of this matter, and I want to help them if I can?

Mr. WEEKS. It will not bother me at all for the Senator to do so.

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course, the Senator thinks that the division of this question so that on educational matter a very low nominal rate shall be imposed and on business or commercial matter a higher rate shall be imposed is desirable if it is practicable, does he not?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, let me point out to the Senator from Georgia why I think his reasoning is faulty in this particular respect. Let us take a paper with which we are all familiar, which most of us see every day. I know nothing about the details of the publication of this paper or its receipts or its profits, or anything of the kind. I am referring to the Washington Star, which has always seemed to me to be a paper which contained a large amount of advertising. I do not suppose that 5 per cent, perhaps not 3 per cent, of the Washington Star publication goes 10 miles from the city of Washington; it is an essentially local paper; and yet if the proposition of the Senator from Georgia were to obtain and become law, this paper, which does not use the mails, practically, at all, would have to pay a very large tax to enable the Government to carry other publications to the limits of the country.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator yield to me again?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think the Senator is quite right about that, and that is giving me more trouble than any other one thing which is connected with this proposition, for even if we were to retain the purely nominal rate on educational matter and were to impose a greater rate on the advertising part of the publication in order to make it pay its own way, yet I realize that any flat-rate system which is necessary from the standpoint of educational matter could not be applied to the advertising matter without the very great injustice to which the Senator refers being perpetrated; in other words, without some publications being required to carry the burdens of some of the others; but in order to obviate that, I will say to the Senator, the Post Office Department is now engaged in the preparation of another amendment, by which they hope to establish this sort of a system if they can get it adopted either here in the Senate or in conference: First, that on the educational news matter, reading matter of all sorts, the present flat rate of 1 cent per pound shall be maintained throughout the country; and, second, that on the advertising matter a system of zone charges—that is the business way to do that, because it is so much per mile, according to the distance—shall be established, modeled on the present rates of the parcel post. That will make each one of these publications pay to the Government what it costs to handle its business. Does not the Senator from Massachusetts think—and I hope he will pardon my long statement—that if that sort of a system could be worked out it would afford the ideal solution of this question?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes, Mr. President, if it can be worked out so that it will do justice to everyone and apply at the proper time, I am quite confident that I shall be with the Senator from Georgia; but this is a tax bill, and we are supposed to be taxing those who have made profits. The proposition which we are at this time considering is that of imposing an additional tax on those who are laboring under very great and burdensome conditions. That is what I am objecting to.

If the Washington Star, to which I have referred—I assume it is a prosperous paper; I hope so—is a prosperous paper, the owners of the paper are going to pay exactly the same tax that the owners of a mill here in Washington or the owners of a mill in Augusta, Ga., or in Boston, Mass., will pay, or the profiteer engaged in any other class of business will pay. What we are proposing here is imposing an additional tax on them.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will permit me, I want to say that I am in thorough accord with him about that. There is no justification whatever for this special tax on publishers—and the Lord knows I have no reason to love them—but if they are getting a bounty from the Government, we ought not to continue that bounty. We can no longer justify the imposition of a single dollar of taxes upon the people of this country when millions of those taxes are going into the pockets of those people. Be that as it may, however, and regardless of that question, we can not set off against the bounty, if we are unjustly or carelessly allowing them a bounty, a tax that has no justification whatever and which ought not to be imposed upon them.

Mr. WEEKS. I want to bring to the attention of the Senate—for I have taken very much more time than I had intended—some of the statements made by representative publications of what their business was last year, is this year, and will be next year under the new conditions for print paper. Some of these statements are sworn to, and they indicate my real substantial reason for opposing any legislation on this subject in this bill.

Here is the Christian Herald, of New York City. The circulation of the Christian Herald in 1916 was 309,210; the number of persons regularly employed was 175; the total amount of postage paid in 1916, at 1 cent a pound, was $39,628. With second-class postage as proposed in the Senate bill of a cent and a quarter a pound that would add $9,907 to what was paid by this publication, making a total of $49,535 if their circulation shall be as great this year as it was last year. The increase in the cost of paper for the year 1917 over 1916 will be $87,511.34. The expenditure of this publication for postage other than for second-class postage was $24,100. Adding 50 per cent to that would make $12,050 more, or a total of $36,150. The net profits of the Christian Herald for the year 1916 amounted to $1,988; in other words, a profit of $1,988 will be turned into a deficit if these various propositions become effective of about $100,000; and of course a paper of that kind can not be published under such conditions.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question about the figures given for that publication?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand the figures which the Senator has read, even if we do not change the rates on second-class postage, that publication will be a great loser.

Mr. WEEKS. That paper will be.

Mr. NORRIS. Regardless of what is done here.

Mr. WEEKS. They will. Of course the 5 per cent tax on profits over $4,000 which is proposed in this bill would have no effect on them, because they will not have profits of $4,000.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And is that not a very desirable class of publications to maintain?

Mr. WEEKS. The point I want to make is that here is a publication which goes to the religious people of this country. It is desirable to maintain a publication of that kind if it can be done, and should we at such a time as this impose unreasonable burdens on it in the shape of taxation we would probably destroy what is of great public use and value.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, since the Senator has made that comment, may I say to him that I asked my question not because I was antagonizing the proposition, but I thought it illustrated an additional point that the Senator had not called to the attention of the Senate. So far as I am individually concerned, I have always favored the zone system for periodicals and newspapers. At the same time I think there is a great deal in the argument that this perhaps is not a good time to do it. I am not, however, in favor of levying war taxes on newspapers any more than I am in favor of levying war taxes on lawyers or doctors.

Mr. WEEKS. And the Senator will keep in his mind that these taxes which we are imposing are in addition to taxes which these periodicals will bear, anyway. They will pay exactly the same taxes that everybody else will have to pay if they have any income to tax.

Mr. NORRIS. So far as any war tax is concerned, it seems to me that is what ought to be done. That is, however, separate and apart from whether they are getting a subsidy now from the Government and whether they ought to pay somewhere near the cost of the transportation of their publications.

Mr. WEEKS. There would not be, Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Nebraska, anything to this movement at all; it never would have been thought of if it had not gotten into the minds of people that the publishers were receiving a subsidy, as some of them quite likely are receiving a subsidy, which is beneficial to themselves; but more largely that subsidy is being passed on to their subscribers, because, as the Senator will see from the few statements that I am going to read, publications like the Christian Herald are not money-making businesses; they are mutual in a way and are beneficial to the whole community.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question before he leaves this subject?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. We all understand that as the expenses of manufacturers increase, where they are producing clothing or merchandise of any kind, they are able to add to the price of their commodity when they put it on the market to meet conditions. Is it possible for these publishers to increase their subscriptions so as to meet this increased cost?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Vermont that there has been an attempt, as far as possible, to do it, and there has been some little increase in advertising rates. In a few instances where the publishers thought they were able to do it they have increased the subscription price; but in other cases where they have attempted to increase the subscription price they lost so many subscribers that it affected their advertising, and they had to go back to the old rate.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. In other words, their product is not absolutely necessary; people can get along without it.

Mr. WEEKS. Their product is not a necessity at all; it goes to the rich and poor alike.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. But the larger part of the income of these periodicals comes from advertising rates, and I think the Senator himself has already stated that they have raised their rates of advertising to meet the new conditions.

Mr. WEEKS. No, Mr. President; I did not say they had raised them to meet the new conditions; I stated they had raised them as far as possible attempting to meet new conditions.

Mr. McKELLAR. Advertising is just as great a necessity in the business world now as any other product, practically speaking.

Mr. WEEKS. Not at all, Mr. President. It depends entirely upon whether advertising is profitable or not, and every big advertiser knows to a nicety whether his advertising is profitable.

Now, Mr. President, let me take a publication which goes to the farmers, the Farm and Home, the western edition, which is published at Chicago, Ill., and the eastern edition at Springfield, Mass. If the House rates were applied to this particular paper, it would cost it for postage next year $151,000. It paid last year $35,971. The increase in postage would be $115,000. The increase in the cost of print paper for that paper next year will be $57,577, or a total increase of $172,686. That is a comparatively profitable paper, and yet it only made a profit last year of $64,000; so that it would show a deficit for this year if the House rates were imposed of $108,000. Can it be possible that Congress is going to take a prosperous industry like this and so tax it that it must necessarily go out of business?

Under the rates proposed by the Senator from Tennessee the loss would not be so great, but there would be a material loss because it has a very wide circulation. I do not know what the loss would be if we tried to tax advertising. I have not been able to figure it out; but even if the Senate committee's proposition were to be applied to this paper it would show a net loss next year of at least $5,000, without figuring any increased cost in its preparation except the increased cost in the price of print paper.

Let me take the Youth's Companion. Almost every man within the sound of my voice has at some time read the Youth's Companion, and his children have read it, and I hope his grandchildren will read it. It has a very wide circulation, including a large circulation on the Pacific coast. It is one of the oldest papers in the country; I think it has been published for 90 years. Incidentally it has bought its print paper of the same manufacturer for the past 60 years, and naturally under those circumstances the very best possible business relations obtain between the publisher and the manufacturer of the paper, so that the best possible terms are being given to the publisher. The Youth's Companion has a circulation of 431,000; it paid last year $39,000 in postage. Increasing it, according to the Senate's amendment, would add $9,729. If the zone system were to apply to it, it would cost $163,000 for its second-class mail privilege.

The total increase in cost of print paper for the year 1917 over the year 1916 will be $94,320. Last year this paper did not make one-third as much as the increase in its white paper cost will be for next year; and it has not averaged, for the last 10 years, to make two-thirds as much as the increased cost of its print paper. It is sure to show a deficit. I assume that it has considerable reserves, because it has been a profitable paper for a great many years; and yet not even that paper can go on publishing for many years under these conditions with regard to print paper without going to the wall or increasing its subscription and advertising prices, which I am informed it has done as far as possible.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. Suppose the cost of print paper increases, say, half a cent a pound, would the Senator suggest, in order to encourage these papers, that we should give them the postal privileges free and not make the present charge of 1 cent a pound?

Mr. WEEKS. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio is asking now a ridiculous question, which he does not expect me to answer seriously.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not know; the question may seem ridiculous to the Senator, but I assure him that my question is no more ridiculous to the Senator from Massachusetts than his argument is to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator from Ohio is one of the Senators whom I did not expect to influence by my argument. I am greatly honored by his presence, but, knowing his views, I did not expect to influence him; and if he had been the only Senator in the Chamber I should have discontinued my argument long ago.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am quite sure that the Senator can not be persuaded that his argument is wrong, no matter what evidence might be brought against it.

Mr. WEEKS. No; he can not.

Mr. POMERENE. I am sure of that.

Mr. WEEKS. Let me ask the Senator from Ohio a question which I think he will not consider ridiculous. Would he like to put the Youth's Companion out of business, or would he think it well for this country to do it?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I may say, in answer to the Senator's question, that I have been one of those who in past years have read the Youth's Companion. I think it is a very wholesome publication. I think it is one of the fine publications that every man would like to have every child in the community read, if he could.

Mr. WEEKS. I think so, too.

Mr. POMERENE. But that is not any reason why we should pay the expense of its publication; and it does seem to me that it would be a very easy matter for them to increase their rates, either of advertising or of subscription.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, one of the reasons why Congress made a low transportation rate years and years and years ago was for the purpose of disseminating reading matter for the benefit of the people of the country. Congress believed at that time, and it has been believed ever since by a good many people, that we could well afford to make this loss, whatever it may be, in carrying second-class mail if we were giving a distribution to such publications as the Christian Herald, the Youth's Companion, these farm papers which I have quoted, and other papers to which I will make reference. They benefit the country, they help build up industries, and they furnish wholesome reading matter which is of benefit to every child in the country. Even assuming, as I am willing to assume, that we ought to increase the second-class rates at the proper time, I do not believe we have wasted one dollar of our substance in distributing second-class mail on the terms we have followed in the past.

To indicate that the increase in the price of white paper is not the only additional cost with which these papers are having to deal, let me give you the increased cost to the Southgate Press, of Boston. They state that under the new agreement which is now in force they pay their compositors 22½ per cent more than last year; that while the union wages of pressmen have not changed, they have found it necessary to increase the wages of pressmen 20 per cent in order to hold good men; unskilled labor has increased 25 per cent; machine operators and bundle help have increased 25 per cent; black inks have increased 22½ per cent; various colored inks, 75 per cent; linotype metal, 125 per cent; print paper, in their case, 50 per cent.

Those are quite as large, outside of the print paper, as the average increases in cost which most manufacturers have had to meet in conducting their business during the past year; so that the print-paper item is not the only one with which these people have to deal.

Here is the Outlook Co., issuing a different class of publication. The average circulation of the Outlook per issue during the fiscal year ending the 31st of March was 134,750. One hundred and four persons are on the annual pay roll. The average postage paid was $23,515. Adding one-quarter of a cent to that, which would be carried in the Senate proposition, would make $29,515. The increase in the cost of print paper to the Outlook Co. will be about $40,000. During the last fiscal year it paid the Government $12,000 for first-class postage. If we increase that 50 per cent, that will be another increase in the cost of $6,000. It paid $23,515, as I have stated, for second-class postage. The Outlook's net profits for the year were $19,014. If these increases—the $6,000 for second-class postage, the $6,000 for first-class postage, and the $40,000 for print paper—are added the Outlook, based on its last year's figures, would show a deficit of $32,864.

Here is the People's Home Journal, published in New York——

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JAMES in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHIELDS. I should like to ask the Senator if he has an estimate of what it cost the Government to transport the Outlook magazine during the year for which he has given statistics?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not suppose anybody could tell that.

Mr. SHIELDS. I find an estimate of it in the speech of Mr. KITCHIN in the House.

Mr. WEEKS. If Mr. KITCHIN can tell with any degree of accuracy what it costs to transport any particular paper or publication he is a mind reader and a marvel. I do not believe that any man can tell that. The department has no figures to show it or in any way to demonstrate what it costs to carry a particular periodical.

Mr. SHIELDS. It seems that, considering the amount of material furnished for transportation and the general average of its circulation over the country, some reasonable estimate could be arrived at.

Mr. WEEKS. Some estimate; yes.

Mr SHIELDS. According to Mr. KITCHIN's statement, that magazine cost the Government $161,000 for the same year for which the Senator has given the statistics, which was a loss to the Government of $80,000 that year in the transportation. Can the Senator state the benefits which the great masses of the people of this country receive from that expenditure of $80,000?

Mr. WEEKS. I am not here to make an argument in favor of any particular periodical. I do not know how much benefit came from the Outlook. I do not know how Mr. KITCHIN could obtain figures that indicated with any degree of accuracy any such loss as that; and in that particular instance I do not know anything about it, other than speaking in general terms. Speaking in general terms, I think there has been a large net return to the people of this country from the second-class mail which has been distributed from various sources.

Take the People's Home Journal, published in New York. The average circulation for the year 1916 was 904,000. The total number of persons employed was 350. It paid $37,526 in the way of second-class postage. The increase in the cost of print paper this year over last year will be about $100,000. This company made a loss last year of $754.89. An increase in second-class rates to 1¼ cents would add $9.200. An increase of 50 per cent in their first-class postage would have added $15,000. An increase in the cost of the parcel post and print paper would add $160,000, or that publication, making a loss last year of $754, would apparently show a loss for the coming year of $185,000.

Here is the David C. Cook Publishing Co., of Elgin, Ill. This company was established in 1875, and is the largest publisher of religious periodicals in this country. These publications are used by over 60,000 churches and Sunday schools. Most of the improvements and advancements in Sunday school periodicals in the past 40 years have been devised and put out by companies of this kind. The capital invested in this company is $815,000. Among other publications, it publishes the Mother's Magazine. That is a Sunday school publication. It has a circulation of 600,000. In its various departments it employs regularly about 1,500 men and women. In 1916 it paid in second-class postage $40,500, so that increasing the rate a quarter of a cent a pound would add $10,125 to the cost of its second-class postage. The estimated increase in the cost of paper stock in 1917 over 1916 is $40,000. During 1916 the publication, which had previously made a profit of about $20,000 a year, lost $22,000, owing to the sudden increase in the cost of print paper last year; so that you will have first a deficit of $22,000, an increase of $40.000 in print paper, making $62.000, and an increase of a quarter of a cent a pound in second-class postage, making $10.000 more, or a total of $72,000 as the deficit this year. They paid last year $50,000 in first-class postage. If we increase that 50 per cent it will add $25,000 more to the cost of producing this publication.

For the 26 religious publications issued by this concern, having a total circulation of three and a half million, and employing many hundreds of men, the deficit under the conditions which they know about now, without any increase in postage rates, would be $78,900.

I am not going to take the time of the Senate to read many of these, but there are a few more I want to bring to the attention of the Senate.

Here is Today's Housewife. The average circulation in 1916 was 800,000. There are 225 persons on the pay roll, and 10,000 persons securing subscriptions. If their second-class rate is increased a quarter of a cent a pound and their white paper increased the amount which they know it will be now, that periodical, which showed a loss last year, would show a deficit this year of $119,080.

Here is the Crowell Publishing Co., of New York. Their increased cost of paper this year over last year will be $228,000. The Crowell Publishing Co. is one of the most profitable organizations in the United States, and yet their increase in postage, figuring a quarter of a cent for second-class and 1 cent for first-class postage, with the increase in the cost of print paper, would add to their cost for the year $307,000.

Take the case of the McClure Publishing Co., which publishes McClure's Magazine and the Ladies' World. The combined profit of these two periodicals last year was $68,672. They estimate that the increased cost of white paper for those two publications, which have an aggregate circulation of 1,600,000, will be $223,000, and that the increase in first-class postage, second-class postage, and white paper, will show a deficit for this year of $178,000.

Mr. President, I shall not take the time to read any more of these figures. There are a few more, illustrating the press which caters to different classes of people, which I should like to have unanimous consent to put in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered. The Chair hears no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

BOSTON, July 20, 1917.

Hon. JOHN W. WEEKS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In order that you may have before you actual facts to show how the periodical publishing business would be affected by an increase in second-class postage, we give below, at the request of the postal committee of the Periodical Publishers' Association, figures that accurately picture our business for the year 1916.

1. Name of publication—The Modern Priscilla. A monthly magazine for women, devoted to handicrafts and housekeeping.
2. Average circulation per issue in 1916, 638,091.
3. Total number of persons regularly receiving salary from this company, average 229 for the year 1916. Total pay roll, $148,155.

NOTE.—This does not include the printing department, which is a separate company, controlled but not operated by us. This company employs over 200 people, and has a pay roll larger than our own.

4. Total amount of postage paid in 1916, at 1 cent per pound, $31,139.
5. Increase in postage payments which would have been required had rate been 2 cents per pound, $31,139.
6. Estimated increase in cost of paper to be used in 1917 over cost in 1916.—We have been, and still are, fortunate in the matter of paper. A large part of our paper supply for 1917 will apply on an old contract at a price well below the present market. Even so, however, our 1917 paper will cost us not less than $25,000 more than we paid in 1916. But only good fortune has postponed our heavy increase in the cost of paper until 1918. If we were buying our paper to-day at the market price, as most publishers are and as we shall be in 1918, the annual increased cost would be not less than $70,000.
7. Net profit for year 1916, $65,487.
8. Annual expenditure for first-class postage at present rate, $5,169.
9. Annual expenditure for third class and parcel post.—We paid the Government $13,399 for third-class mail matter during 1916, and for parcel-post matter we paid $13,526. These two items, together with the amount paid for first-class postage, total $32,094, and it is worth noting that this is business classed by the Post Office Department as "profitable."

In analyzing the above figures we hope you will not fail to note that an increase of 1 cent per pound on second-class matter, together with 3-cent first-class postage, would cost us over $36,000, which would be more than 50 per cent of our annual profits. If our increased paper cost for 1917 is added, the total is within $4,000 of our 1916 profits. If good fortune did not save us this year from paying the market price for all paper used, we should be facing a $40,000 deficit.

That the situation which publishers are facing to-day is a serious one no man who analyzes such figures as these can deny.

Yours, very truly,

THE PRISCILLA PUBLISHING CO.,

NEW YORK, August 13, 1917.

Hon. JOHN W. WEEKS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In the belief that you will welcome specific information, I submit herewith the following data, which will enable you to judge the effect on this company of any increase in the second-class postage rate.

McCall's Magazine had an average circulation in 1916 of slightly over 1,325,000 copies per issue.

It carries regularly on its pay rolls between 750 and 800 employees, in addition to the large number of people throughout the country who receive compensation for circulation work.

It paid in second-class postage in 1916, $75,717.54, at the rate of 1 cent per pound. An increase of 1 cent a pound would, of course, double this expenditure.

It paid in first-class postage in 1916, $14,744.27. An increase of 50 per cent in this item will mean an increase of $7,372.14.

The increase in the cost of paper for 1917 over 1916 will be approximately $285,000. All present indications point to prices as high or possibly higher for 1918.

Our net profits for 1916 were $210,298.37.

We have increased the annual subscription price of the magazine and the prices of some of our patterns, but the extra expenditures necessary to maintain the circulation of the magazine at the increased price will probably absorb whatever increased receipts it may produce for at least a full year, and it is certain that the combined increase in revenue from both the magazine and the patterns will not be equal to one-half the increase in the paper cost.

In view of these conditions, any increase in second-class postage is a matter of very vital importance, because it can not be "passed on," and it is the firm conviction of this publication that an increase at the present time is much more likely to actually reduce the Government's revenue than to increase it.

Yours, very truly,

THE MCCALL COMPANY,
ALLAN H. RICHARDSON,
President.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
New York, July 21, 1917.

Hon. JOHN W. WEEKS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: With reference to the proposed increase in second-class postage rate, we take the liberty of respectfully submitting for your consideration the following information regarding Harper's Magazine:

1. The average net cash paid circulation per issue in 1916 was 103,613.
2. The total number of persons actually employed in manufacturing and selling Harper's Magazine and who are regularly receiving payments of salary is 189.
3. The total amount of postage paid in 1916 at 1 cent a pound was $11,652.18.
4. The additional payment which would have been required had the rate been 2 cents a pound is $11,652.18.
5. The estimated increase in cost of paper, etc., to be used in 1917 over cost in 1916 would amount to $47,664.
6. The net profits for year 1916 were $49,282.50.
7. The expenditure for first-class postage during the year 1916 was $57,643.37.

Yours, very truly,

W. B. WELLS, Secretary.

THE CONTINENT,
Chicago, August 11, 1917.

Hon. JOHN W. WEEKS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: With respect to the section of the pending revenue bill providing for an increase of second-class postage to 1½ cents per pound, with a special tax of 5 per cent on the profits of periodicals entitled to second-class rates, the following information is submitted:

The Continent is a religious family weekly, the principal national paper of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America. It is not maintained to make personal profit.

Average circulation, 1916, 32,300.
Total number person employed regularly on salary or commission, 40.
Amount of postage paid 1916 at 1 cent a pound, $3,701.65.
At 2-cent rate increase would have been $3,701.65.
Estimated increase cost of paper stock, 1916, $10,000.
Profits in 1916, none.
Annual expenditure first-class postage at 2 cents, $1,800.

In addition these facts regarding the effect of other plans suggested in the House and Senate are submitted:

1. Ways and Means plan (zone system).

	Present average cost, 5 years.	New cost.	Increase.
First zone (1½ cents)	$176.80	$265.20	$88.40
Second and third zones (2 cents)	729.04	1,458.08	729.04
Fourth and fifth zones (3 cents)	2,668.08	8,004.24	5,336.16
Sixth zone (4 cents)	109.72	438.88	329.16
Seventh zone (5 cents)
Eighth zone (6 cents)	340.60	2,043.60	1,703.01
	4,024.24	12,210.00	8,185.76

The above added cost equals 26 cents on each subscription.

2. Hardwick plan (advertising section of paper):

(a) The average amount of space given to advertising in this periodical is 25 per cent.

(b) Annual postage now on entire paper, $4,024.24.

Three-fourths of paper (reading) at 1 cent	$3,018.18
One-fourth (advertising) at 8 cents	8,048.48
Total cost	11,166.66
Increase over 1916 cost	7,142.42

Average per subscription, 23 cents.

3. Original Finance Committee plan (1½ cents postage, 2 per cent on advertising):

Gross advertising revenue, 1916	$34,879.80
2 per cent tax	679.59

Average per subscription, 2.2 cents.

4. Combination plan (1¼ cents postage, 1½ per cent on advertising):

Postage, at 1¼ cents	$5,030.30
Tax on advertising, 1½ per cent	523.29
Total	5,553.59
Present postage	4,024.24
Increase over 1916 cost	1,529.35

Average per subscriber, 4.9 cents.

5. One and one-half cents postage:

Present cost	$4,024.24
At 1½ cents	6,036.36
Increase	2,012.12

Average per subscriber, 6.4 cents.

6. Bulk plan:

	Cents.
Up to 10,000 pounds of one issue	1
Next 15,000 pounds of same issue	1½
Next 25,000 pounds of same issue	1¼
Next 25,000 pounds of same issue	1½
Next 25,000 pounds of same issue	1¾
Over 100,000 pounds of same issue	2

Maximum rate on periodicals carrying no advertising, 1 cent per pound. Under this plan the periodical considered, since it mails less than 10,000 pounds per issue, would continue to pay 1 cent per pound.

7. One cent up to 300 miles, 1½ cents beyond:

	Present.	New.	Increase.
Up to 300 (1)	$905.84	$905.84
Over 300 (1½)	3,118.40	4,677.60	$1,559.20

Average per subscriber, 5 cents.

Respectfully, yours,

OLIVER R. WILLIAMSON,
Publisher.

220 WEST FORTY-SECOND STREET,
NEW YORK, July 31, 1917.

Hon. JOHN W. WEEKS,
The United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I beg to submit the following facts relating to Sunset Magazine and in connection with the proposed increased postage bill:

1. Average circulation per month for the year 1916, 129,037.
2. The total number of persons employed regularly, 46.
3. Total amount paid in 1916 for paper, $52,000.
4. Total amount in postage paid in 1916 at 1 cent per pound, $15,480.
5. Amount paid in 1916 for first-class postage, $1,874.
6. Deficit, 1916, $12,710.19.
7. Estimated increase cost of paper 1917 over 1916, $21,214.
8. Increased cost of postage if rate is raised from 1 to 2 cents per pound, $15,480.

So far this year we have managed to break a little better than even. Therefore the deficit last year can be eliminated. The increased cost of paper runs into a sum which alone it will be difficult to overcome, to say nothing of an increased cost of postage.

Due to a circulation campaign which we have been carrying on for the past five months we are spending a considerably larger sum for first-class postage this year than last.

Respectfully, yours,

SUNSET MAGAZINE,
WM. A. WILSON,
Eastern Manager.

THE CENTURY CO.,
NEW YORK, July 23, 1917.

Hon. JOHN W. WEEKS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WEEKS: At the suggestion of Mr. Allan H. Richardson, chairman of the postal committee of the Periodical Publishers' Association of America, I take pleasure in sending you the following data concerning the Century and St. Nicholas Magazines published by this company:

Average circulation per issue in 1916, Century, 68,659.

Average circulatin per issue in 1916, St. Nicholas, 62,598.

Total number of persons who regularly receive salary or commission payments from our company, 131.

Total amount of postage paid in 1916 at 1 cent a pound, $17,232.07.

Increase in postage payments which would have been required had rate been 2 cents a pound, $17,232.07.

Estimated increase in cost of paper to be used in 1917 over cost in 1916, $53,497.81.

Net profits for year 1916, both magazines, $5,860.56.

Annual expenditure for first-class postage at present rate, $3,618.05.

Very sincerely,

W. MORGAN SHUSTER, President.

Mr. WATSON and Mr. SHIELDS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield, and to whom?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield first to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator this question: I have not had the privilege of hearing him all the way through. What is his solution of the problem—to let the matter be as it is?

Mr. WEEKS. Absolutely, now.

Mr. WATSON. Without any increase of any kind?

Mr. WEEKS. Without any increase of any kind.

Mr. WATSON. On the theory that the service rendered by publications of this character justifies the subsidy paid by the Government?

Mr. WEEKS. Not entirely on that theory, Mr. President.

Mr. WATSON. Partly on that theory?

Mr. WEEKS. As I have stated, I think they do render a great service to the people of the country; but, at the same time, I think they ought to pay relatively the cost to the Government. These costs, as I have stated to-day, have been tremendously overestimated; but this is the time of all times when we should not make any change, because, as I have tried to demonstrate in the few instances which I have read here—and I can obtain hundreds of them—the average periodical is not making any money at all now; and here is, perhaps, the best-posted man in connection with the whole publication business who says that if all the publications in the United States pooled their statements this year, they would show a loss of $10,000,000. That is due largely to the increased cost of white paper, to other increased costs, and to the inability to pass them along to the purchasers of the periodicals.

Mr. WATSON. What is the cost to the postal revenues of the transmission of second-class matter, in the Senator's opinion? It has been estimated at all the way from seventy-two to eighty-four millions on this floor.

Mr. WEEKS. In my opinion, from 3 to 4 cents a pound would amply cover it.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHIELDS. The statement I understand the Senator has made of a definite amount for the periodicals is predicated upon the theory that they will not increase their incomes from subscriptions or from advertising, but will continue the same old rate notwithstanding the price of every other commodity in the country has increased. I understand the Senator's statement was predicated upon that theory.

Mr. WEEKS. I think so, and I have tried to explain that publications as far as possible have been increasing their subscription and their advertising rates and in many cases have reached the limit which they can go without affecting their circulation.

Mr. SHIELDS. There is another matter upon which I should like to have information, if the Senator can give it. I understood the Senator to read the statement of the business of a house publishing 26 religious papers.

Mr. WEEKS. The David C. Cook Co.

Mr. SHIELDS. Are they of the same denomination?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know. I think probably not.

Mr. SHIELDS. It occurred to me that that was entirely different; that they were not publishing the papers for religious purposes, but just covering the whole field.

Mr. WEEKS. The figures indicate that there will be no net profit remaining.

Now, Mr. President, just one word before I conclude.

Mr. SHIELDS. I should like to correct the statement I made about Mr. KITCHIN'S figures. I was quoting him, and I want to quote him correctly, in regard to the Outlook.

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. KITCHIN, in his speech in the House, gave his figures as follows:

For every dollar the publisher of the Outlook pays to the United States Government for transporting and handling and distributing it, it costs the United States Government $8, and I do not believe it is right or fair or just or honest for all the people of the United States to be taxed, as they have been, to pay a subsidy of over $140,000 to a magazine like the Outlook. The facts are—

And this is what I wanted to read—

Last fiscal year the Government hauled, handled, and distributed 1,898,812 pounds of the Outlook. It cost the Government $161,000. It received from the publishers of the Outlook only $19,000. The Government paid for transportation alone over $80,000.

I gave the figures wrong in my statement awhile ago, and I merely desire to give them as Mr. KITCHIN used them.

Mr. WEEKS. I am not able to follow those figures accurately, but I should think Mr. KITCHIN figured the cost of the Government at 9 cents a pound to transport and to deliver the Outlook. If he has, in my judgment, he has used a figure which is certainly twice as large as it should be, and I think three times as large as it should be, based on parcel-post rates.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am disposed to agree very largely with what the Senator from Massachusetts has been saying. It seems to me the whole question of postal rates is to be approached from one of either of two angles, as a revenue producer or as a matter of equitable adjustment of cost to the Government. As a revenue producer, I quite agree with what the Senator is saying, that we had no business to fix a special tax upon it.

Now, then, as a matter of fair charges on the part of the Government the proponents of the various amendments predicate their amendments upon the proposition, as I gather it, that the Government ought to be paid cost for the service rendered. I should like to test, and perhaps the Senator can test for me, the consistency of the various amendments with the reasons given. Therefore I ask this question: Can the Senator say whether or not any amendment has been offered here that will produce to the Government the full cost of the service rendered? Will, for instance, the amendment of the Senator from Georgia yield to the Government an amount of revenue from second-class mail that will compensate the Government dollar for dollar for the cost of carrying that mail?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think anybody knows that. If the amendment of the Senator from Georgia became a law, it would impose a very large additional tax against one class of publications for the benefit of another class of publications.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I understood that a while ago, but what I have in mind is if there is going to be an attempt to readjust these rates so as to make the publications pay for the service rendered we ought to be sure, if that is going to be the line of reasoning adopted by the Senate, that the scheme adopted will compensate fully and not partially.

Mr. WEEKS. I think we ought to be sure we are not doing more harm than good, and we are not sure of that if we adopt any of these proposed amendments, in my judgment. The Finance Committee proposition is, of course, along the lines which we ought to follow in case we make any changes in rates; that is, to commence in a very small way. If we come to the conclusion that 3 cents a pound is a rate which second-class mail should carry, I would be in favor of raising the rate not more than a quarter or a third of a cent a year, giving the press time to adjust their advertising rates and their cost to the new conditions.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator yield to me once more?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The point I have in mind is this, as a conclusive proposition: It seems to be the unanimous sentiment of this body, as I have gathered it, that this increase of postage is not justified because it does an irreparable damage to a large amount of business. Now, let us approach it from the other angle, namely, the matter of just compensation to the Government for the service rendered, which seems to be the point of view of all those who are proposing these various amendments, considering it in that light. If any proposed amendment readjusting the rates will yield to the Government a revenue from the second-class mail which, in substance, amounts, for illustration, to granting the publishing business a bounty of $40,000,000 instead of as at present a bounty of $80,000,000, what justification can there be for granting that much bounty at this time?

Mr. WEEKS. I am not arguing that question.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I know the Senator is not on that side of the question. I want to get the Senator's view.

Mr. WEEKS. I am not arguing that question at this time, because I do not think this is the time when anything should be done. I have been trying to say to the Senate that in my judgment the publication business of this country is showing a deficit to-day under present conditions and we are trying to get the revenue to carry the war from those who are making excessive revenues, and the taxes we are imposing under this proposition, or under any one of these, is in addition to the tax which everybody else will pay.

Mr. WOLCOTT. To be sure.

Mr. WEEKS. I say that this is a transportation question, and a delivering-of-the-mail question, a post-office question, instead of a revenue question.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think the Senator is right.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. Along the line of inquiry of the Senator from Delaware, I understand it is not pretended that any of the advances in rates will anywhere near meet the deficit. I understand that the additional one-fourth of a cent proposed by the Senate committee will only bring about $3,000,000 and the 5 per cent tax on war profits about $5,000,000. In other words, it is less than $8,000,000 that the Senate committee amendment will bring, the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] about $12,000,000, and the House provision about $19,000,000, notwithstanding the deficit is about $70,000,000, as practically admitted by everybody.

Mr. WEEKS. It is not admitted by me. I take issue with that.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then, by everybody else?

Mr. WEEKS. Not by many people who have really investigated the question.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Post Office Department asserts it at not less than $72,000,000, and that is pretty good and fair authority.

Mr. WEEKS. I think it is not good authority on that question.

Mr. SHIELDS. It was the evidence of Gen. Stewart before the Finance Committee when examined on this very question, that it is not less than $72,000,000; but that is immaterial; it is a large sum that would be wiped out. The Senator from Delaware suggests that the provision ought to be made to wipe out that deficit at once. I am in favor of increasing the rate where the compensation now is not proportionate to the service rendered but not in any such sum as that. To wipe out the deficit I think would work a great dislocation of business and would seriously damage business after so many years in which the Government has conducted such business. The increases ought to be gradual. Perhaps that derived from the McKellar amendment is enough at this time; but it establishes the principle that no longer will this subsidy be granted, that from year to year the tax will be increased until they pay for a reasonable part of the service rendered.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee if the McKellar amendment provides for an increase as time goes on? That requires new legislation, does it not? If the McKellar amendment is adopted it does not establish any progressive increase in rates. Those who support the McKellar amendment are in favor of granting some bounty but not quite this much bounty. That is what it amounts to.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator is mistaken. Those who support the McKellar amendment are not in favor of granting any bounty. They are not in favor of that principle. It may be that in the end it will be impossible to require of the publishers enough to transport their periodicals, their commodity, or what you may call it, but the Post Office Department is not in business for profit. It would be a good thing to have every service rendered paid for, but it may be and always will be, I think, that this public-utility company, we might call it, will never be compensated for the service it has rendered. Very largely that will apply to these agricultural papers; perhaps to some newspapers; it may be to some educational papers; but in the main such a policy ought to be adopted that will make everyone who patronizes them pay at least a reasonable compensation for the service rendered.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, this question is as old as the Postal Service. I have been in Congress for 12 years, and it has been thrashed out in pretty nearly every Congress of which I have been a Member. Congress has deliberately left it as it is. Now it is a postal question. I have admitted that rates are not as high as cost to the Government, but I say it is a question which should be considered on its merits, not as a punishment to these publishers, and it has no place in a revenue bill and would not be thought of as a revenue proposition if it was not the general belief that the rate is lower than it should be. I do not want Senators to forget that the publishers are paying exactly the same tax that everyone else is paying on their profits. I think the estimate for expected receipts from this item is $5,000,000. If that is correct, the amount of the 5 per cent tax on over $4,000 receipts which is estimated by the committee is not dependable, in fact it is excessive. I have no doubt that the gentleman who estimates the net loss to the total publications of the country is nearer the fact than any statement of excess profits. I believe that at some other time, on its merits, this proposition should be considered, and I want to say I believe the press should cooperate with Congress in bringing about a reasonable rate for the transportation of their product. If they do not do it, they are a great deal more selfish than I think they are. I think that can be done, but in any case I believe it would be an unrighteous procedure at this time to impose an additional burden on a great industry of this kind.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, at this point I desire to submit some observations on the pending question, and in doing that I shall be very brief.

First I shall state briefly why I can not support sections 1101 and 1106 of this bill. Section 1101 increases the postage rate on newspapers 25 per cent and section 1106 provides that, in addition to the excess profits tax which all business must pay, the net income of every individual, corporation, partnership, or association arising from the publication of newspapers, magazines, or periodicals entitled to be entered as second-class mail matter in excess of $4,000 per annum shall contribute a revenue tax of 5 per cent.

I think it is manifest to anyone who has given the subject of second-class mail rates any investigation whatever that a more equitable adjustment should be provided. The question has been before Congress for some time, and prior to the war the Post Office Committee of the Senate, of which I have been chairman for four years, had given a great deal of consideration to the subject of reducing the rate on first-class mail and an increase of the rates on second-class matter. The primary purpose years ago to encourage the publication and distribution of newspapers and periodicals for the dissemination of knowledge and information is not so important as it was then. In those days there were few newspapers or magazines and the means of publication were crude and expensive. This is no longer true with respect to the publishing business, which has greatly grown and developed within the last quarter of a century. It is not fair that those who pay 2 cents an ounce, or a fraction thereof, for sending first-class mail to carry on their business and social affairs should contribute thereby some $80,000,000 to $90,000,000 annually to make up the loss sustained by the Government in transporting second-class mail matter at 1 cent per pound. The greatest beneficiaries of this manifest discrimination, however, are not the newspapers, including the weekly press, whose zones of circulation, with but few exceptions, are within comparative short distances of the points of publication, but rather those publications whose circulation and distribution extend throughout the country, and the immense quantity of catalogues and circulars mailed as second-class matter. An important phase of this question which must not be ignored is that the newspapers are an economical necessity, with an intimate relationship to the social and business affairs of the Nation, affording all classes of the public a very cheap method of not only procuring information of a general character essential to a republic like this, but the business life and activity of the Nation depends in a very large measure upon the information gathered daily from the columns of the newspapers which go into the homes of practically every citizen of the United States, and in a large majority of homes they are the only periodical publications they can afford. It is well known that if these publications had to rely upon the subscription price alone, which more often is less than the cost of publication, nearly all of them would be forced to suspend. Whatever burden we impose upon them, as in similar revenue measures, will be transmitted to the ultimate consumer, in this instance the great reading public.

In addition to the proposed increase in mail rates, newspapers and periodicals are required by this bill to pay a tax of 5 per cent on their net income in excess of $4,000 besides also the general provision which has been under discussion for several days providing for a certain per cent of excess profits applicable to every kind and character of business. Why should the newspapers be singled out for two additional sources of revenue not applicable to other lines of business? Within the last two or three years the increased cost of publication of newspapers and periodicals has been greater perhaps than that of most any other business, if recent statements are to be credited. The Federal Trade Commission, in a late report laid before Congress, has this to say with reference to the cost of print paper:

> Conditions in the newspaper publishing business were reported by the commission in March as serious, and they continue to be serious. Within the year prices to large consumers of print paper have been advanced from about $40 per ton to over $60 and $70 per ton, and in some cases even up to $90 per ton. Also by concerted action the terms of contracts have been so changed as to shift a considerable financial burden from the manufacturers to the publishers. To some of the larger newspapers of the country this price increase means, in some instances, an increase in paper cost of hundreds of thousands of dollars. This, in many cases, will not only cause the loss of profits for the year but a serious financial embarassment of the publication itself.
> The smaller publishers have been forced to pay prices as high as $150 and $180 per ton. In addition to the above increase of prices among publishers of minor dailies and weeklies, it is complained that they found great difficulty in getting paper at any price, and to a large number of such publishers in the country the increase in the price means the difference between a living margin and the complete ruin of their business and the suspension of their publications.
> The financial strength of great daily publications may enable them to survive; it is the smaller newspapers that will probably suffer the most seriously if these conditions continue. The small weekly and daily publications of the country particularly serve a great and useful purpose in the dissemination of facts and in the creation of an intelligent public opinion, and such disaster as impends by reason of this increase in price of news-print paper makes the question one of great public concern.

I have just read from the report of the Federal Trade Commission as the result of their thorough investigation of the question of the price of print paper and the increased price which publishers are required to pay.

The increased cost of labor and ink and other overhead charges have certainly kept pace with the recent advance of high prices. The newspapers have been loyal to the Government in this war emergency and have contributed generously of their columns in free advertising to promote the interest of the public without compensation of any character except the consciousness of having performed their duty in supporting the Government. They have given freely of their space, which is their source of income, to the campaigns for recruits, for the American Red Cross, and for the first liberty loan. Congress should provide an appropriation to remunerate these publications for legitimate advertising space which the Government must use in promoting the second liberty loan and other activities in the nature of appeals through the columns of the newspapers for assistance. The English and Canadian Governments have recognized the justice of such action and appropriated large sums for that purpose.

Why should we impose a burden on them we do not exact of other lines of business?

For these reasons I shall vote against the adoption of the section increasing the rate on second-class mail matter because I do not think it is neither the proper time or the proper basis for making a change, and will vote against the section imposing an income tax on the publishing business because of the other burdens they must carry. I fail to see why they should be called upon for taxation not applicable to other forms of business. In the future, when conditions become more normal, Congress ought to give attention to and adjust second-class mail rates to the end that this character of mail shall more nearly bear its just and proportionate cost of transportation.

Mr. President, I realize, as every other Senator must realize, the great inequality that has been carried in the provisions of the postal laws for many years. There ought to be a remedy found and applied. But the question to my mind is whether it ought to be done as speedily as some have indicated at this particular time. I am inclined to support the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee with reference to second-class mail matter, and beyond that I could not think of going. This whole matter ought to be relegated to the Post Office Committee, where it properly belongs. Some seem to think that after the passage of this bill comes the deluge, and it is the last opportunity we will ever have to legislate upon these important subjects, and therefore we ought to legislate with the greatest possible severity, because we may not have the opportunity again to legislate on this question.

Now, that is all I care to say on this subject.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce that my colleague, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is absent on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, this morning the Senate struck out the amendment providing for 3-cent letter postage, and I think very wisely acted in that regard. I am afraid that some Senators may think that because we have struck out the proposed increase on first-class postal matters we should proceed to strike out the small increase on second-class matter. I want to point out, if I can, the very great difference between the two propositions.

In the first place, letter postage is already paying the Government the immense profit of $70,000,000 a year. Why should we increase a rate of taxation on a subject of taxation that is already paying the Government so splendidly unless there is a real necessity for doing so? The Senate thought there was not a real necessity for it; it thought that we could raise this revenue from other and better sources, and very wisely, I think, declined to tax the people on this particular service in addition to the enormous tax they are now paying. For my part, I had rather increase the tax on war profits and raise the revenue in that way than to put additional tax burdens on people less able to pay them.

Now, let us compare that situation with the situation as to second-class mail matter. Instead of second-class matter paying the Government a profit it is producing a tremendous deficit. The loss on second-class mail matter is about $89,000,000 annually. We get the pitiful sum of $11,000,000 now for transporting all the second-class matter through our mails, and the publishers receive the enormous bounty of $89,000,000. It has got to be a notorious situation, and I am going to stop right here and now and read a very short editorial which I have just this morning noticed in the Philadelphia Inquirer, one of the papers that would be affected by the change. Just listen to this editorial. It is so full of good sense, of justice, and of fairness that I think it ought to make some impression. The editorial is as follows:

EIGHTY MILLION DOLLARS IN SUBSIDIES.

According to Senator HARDWICK the periodicals of the country are carried through the mails as second-class matter at a loss to the Government of $80,000,000 annually.

That loss amounts to a direct subsidy paid to the various publications. It makes mendicants out of them.

The House undertook to right this outrageous wrong by establishing a zone system, under the provisions of which postage would increase in proportion to distance. The Senate Finance Committee cut out this just zone system and replaced it with a fourth-cent postage increase and a tax of 5 per cent upon the net income of newspaper and magazine publications. The Senate for two days has been trying to straighten this matter out. But it never will be settled until it is settled right, and there is but one right settlement—wipe out that $80,000,000 deficiency.

The 5 per cent tax is utterly indefensible, since it is discriminatory and mixes taxation with postal matters. Besides, the tax, it is estimated, would produce only $7,500,000, while the additional quarter-cent postage would yield only about $3,000,000. Here is a total of $10,000,000 against a loss of $80,000,000.

That is absurd. It is wretched business.

The thing to do, of course, is to abandon the 5 per cent discriminatory tax and increase second-class postal rates to a more equitable basis.

I can not commend that editorial too highly to the Senate. In a few words it points out precisely what our duty is. We ought to establish a fair and a just system of postal charges.

Now I want to call the attention of the Senate for a moment to some of the arguments which have been made in behalf of continuing this subsidy. Mind you, it is the only subsidy which this Government grants which is in itself a subsidy. It grants a subsidy of about one-eleventh or one-twelfth of all our revenues in normal times. Why should this subsidy be granted? Well, it is said that a flat rate is better because we have a flat rate on first-class mail matter. Senators know the difference. First-class mail matter is so small in weight in comparison with its importance, and in comparison with the tax that is levied on it, that distance becomes immaterial. It is the one exception to the rule. There is no rule that has not an exception.

Let us see whether the transportation of second-class mail matter on a flat rate basis is in accord with the general course of business. I want to call attention to the fact that all other transportation except first-class mail matter alone is carried according to the length of haul. For instance, as to passengers and freight and everything else that is hauled, whether by wagon, by automobile, by railroad or whatever method of transportation, the length of haul is the measure of the charge. Why should it not be so as to second-class mail matter? The Government pays the railroad on the length of the haul, but the publishers pay the Government a flat rate at a loss of $80,000,000 a year. I do not wonder that the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts could not defend it. He said he could not defend it. The only thing he asked was to just let it go over during the war. He said, "It is all wrong; it is a wrong proposition—I admit that—but just let it go over during the war." You never found one of these interests drawing a bounty from the Government which did not want to let it go over for the present; just postpone it; just defer it; anything in the world to continue the bounty; to get rid of the question and still keep the bounty or subsidy.

Senators, great stress has been laid by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] on farm publications and religious journals. Yes; and you will find that the other House excepted farm journals and religious journals, and that the Senate Committee struck out the exception; yet when it comes to an argument of the merits of the case we hear nothing about the Curtis Publishing Co. that is drawing $4,700,000 a year as a bounty from the Government; but we only hear about the religious journals and the farm journals and the scientific journals. That argument is a subterfuge, pure and simple.

I am perfectly willing to except from the operations of this proposed law journals of the character referred to; I can realize that there is some reason for permitting them to have some advantage in the matter of rates; or whether there is a reason or not, I am willing to yield that; but surely we must not let the main issue be lost sight of, which is that the great corporations have grown strong and fat upon a Government bounty, one of them alone, the Curtis Publishing Co., virtually drawing down from the Government every year $4,700,000; and I say that we should measure our action here as to how it affects those kind of companies and not let it go off on the specious argument that the bounty helps the farm journal and the religious journal. The House excepted them, and we can except them also, and I shall vote for such an amendment if it is offered.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], however, says that the Post Office Department has indorsed another scheme, a flat rate on advertising. Well, I think the Post Office Department does give that scheme its qualified indorsement, but it does it in this way: The Post Office Department realizes that great injustice is being done according to the present rate, and there is but one way to make that right, and that is to change the system so as in the end to make the service self-sustaining. The Post Office Department has also indorsed the zone system; it has also indorsed the proposition that I have presented in my amendment; it receives their hearty approval. The Postmaster General and his assistants all want some system adopted which will make that department of the Government self-sustaining.

Now, let us see what my proposition does. It does not do the whole work; I admit that. It ought to do it, but we can not pass a proposition that will have the effect that the editor of this great newspaper says it ought to have, to make it self-sustaining at one time. The only thing we can do is to adopt a different system and work it out by degrees until we make it self-sustaining.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the other House has indorsed the zone system. It makes no difference as to what system we pass, we shall have a conflict with the House. My proposition is to accept the system that the House has passed and reduce the rates and the amount of revenue raised; and I want the Senate to understand just what difference there is between the House bill and the amendment which I have offered.

Under the provisions of the House bill there will be raised about $19,000,000. My amendment provides that there shall be about $12,600,000 raised. The Senate committee provision for an increase of one-fourth of a cent will raise only $3,000,000. Now, here we are straining every nerve to raise revenue enough to conduct the Government during the war, and here are a lot of people whom the Philadelphia Inquirer calls "mendicants" who have been enjoying for many years this immense bounty, and because we propose to take only $12,600,000 out of the $89,000,000 they are complaining. They are here fighting not only to keep the $78,000,000 but to keep the whole $90,000,000. Ought we to treat them exactly as we do the first-class postal service? I say no. I say a wholly different principle is involved. I say that our vote ought to be entirely different. What we ought to do is to rectify this wrong. The Senator from Massachusetts, however, says let us rectify it at the proper time; that this is not the proper time. Well, it is the most effective time we shall ever have. The Government never needed this money as much as it needs it right now. It needs it worse than it ever did before, and it is unpatriotic in these people to insist upon continuing these bounties. There never was such an easy time to put in effect a just rate as now; this very day it ought to be done. Surely the people to whom we have given so much ought to be willing in this hour of their Government's need to come forward and pay a part of what it costs to transport their matter through the mails.

Mr. President, I call attention to the further fact that we have tried this plan in another part of the Government service. We have tried it in connection with the parcel post. The rate on parcel-post packages is fixed according to the length of the haul, and that service pays the Government the entire cost involved. I see no reason why we should not treat the gentlemen who publish magazines and periodicals and who use the mails in exactly the same way that we treat those who use the parcel post. The Parcel Post Service is doing so well that we are actually taxing it, and surely if it is doing well enough under the zone system to be placed in a position where we may impose a tax upon the service we might make the publishers of second-class mail matter pay their part of the cost of transportation.

Mr. President, that is about all I desire to say; and if no other Senator wishes to discuss the question I ask for a vote and call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CURTIS. I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas makes the point of no quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	Lewis	Simmons

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have not yet arrived at the point where I feel justified in voting for a proposal that I know will destroy a great percentage of the magazines, trade journals, farm papers, religious publications, and other periodicals of the country. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] yesterday and also to-day stated that such periodicals as I have named under the provisions of the House bill are exempt from the proposed increase in rates. I desire now to call the attention of the Senate to the provisions of the House bill, and it will be noticed that that is not the case. Section 1203 of the House provision is as follows:

SEC. 1203. That in the case of newspapers and periodicals entitled to be entered as second-class matter and maintained by and in the interest of religious, educational, scientific, philanthropic, agricultural, labor, or fraternal organizations or associations, not organized for profit and none of the net income of which inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual, the second-class postage rates shall be, irrespective of the zone in which delivered—

That was put in because the House provided a zone system—

(except when the same are deposited in a letter-carrier office for delivery by its carriers, in which case the rates shall be the same as now provided by law), 1¼ cents a pound or fraction thereof from July 1, 1917, until March 1, 1918, and thereafter 1½ cents a pound or fraction thereof. The publishers of such newspapers and periodicals before being entitled to the foregoing rates shall furnish to the Postmaster General, at such times and under such conditions as he may prescribe, satisfactory evidence that none of the net income of such organization inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual.

Mr. President, that specifically increases the rate on second-class matter from 1 cent to 1¼ cents up to March 1, 1918, and to 1½ cents a pound thereafter, even upon such periodicals as those to which I have referred. In order that such periodicals may claim the benefit of the exemption they must show that they are not organized for profit; that not one cent they earn shall inure to the benefit of a stockholder or private individual. That is what the House bill provided, and it was not an exemption of any publication in the country. It was an exemption from the 8-cent rate and the excessively high rates imposed under the zone system provided for in the House bill, but it was not an exemption from any increase in the present rates.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. Has the Senator any figures to show what all the publishers of the newspapers made last year?

Mr. SMOOT. As a whole?

Mr. McKELLAR. As a whole.

Mr. SMOOT. I have them in classes, but not as a whole.

Mr. McKELLAR. About how many millions of dollars was it, just in a general way, all told?

Mr. SMOOT. I could not say offhand just exactly what the total amounted to for all newspapers, periodicals, and publications.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator think that just charging them up with $12,000,000 of the cost of the service would ruin all the periodicals of the country?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; the "Senator from Utah" has not claimed any such thing. The "Senator" has claimed that there are certain newspapers and periodicals published in the United States which, if the Senator's amendment were adopted, would face bankruptcy, and I shall now undertake to prove to the Senate that that is the case. I am not disputing the fact that what we collect from second-class postage rates falls short of paying the expenses to which the Government is put in carrying the same.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator say that the payment of the $12,600,000 provided for in my amendment would bankrupt all the publishers in this country?

Mr. SMOOT. No; the "Senator" has never claimed that it would bankrupt all of the publishers of the country, but the "Senator" does claim that if it were imposed it would destroy a great many of them.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will yield again, I will say that if the Senator will offer an amendment to exclude or to excuse the publications he has just enumerated—that is, religious, scientific, agricultural, and labor journals—I have no doubt that the Senate will agree to that amendment just as the House would agree to it, and, so far as I am concerned, I shall be delighted to vote for it.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. STERLING. I have such an amendment as that suggested by the Senator from Tennessee, which I suppose ought to be offered prior to the vote upon his amendment, which is in the nature of a substitute, when the opportunity arises.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will accept the amendment whenever the Senator offers it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the class of publications suggested by the Senator does not cover all of the periodicals published in the United States which at the present time, with the high price of paper, or even in normal times, are not making any profits to speak of.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator from Utah that the amendment which I shall propose includes not only farm and religious papers, but scientific, educational, agricultural, philanthropic, and labor or fraternal-organization papers—all the periodicals named in the House bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. President, for instance, let us take 86 of the national periodicals of general circulation, and take the profits that were made in 1916 by those 86 national publications. Applying this zone system to them, Mr. President, as a whole they would be taxed over and above what they made in the year 1916 in an amount equaling $1,837,163. Included in those publications are some of the following:

The Gentlewoman, McCall's Magazine, the Woman's Home Companion, the American Magazine, the Pictorial Review, McClure's Magazine, Collier's Weekly, the Modern Priscilla, Leslie's Weekly, the Christian Herald, the Ladies' World, the Popular Science Monthly, Outing, the World's Work, the New Country Life in America, Current Opinion, Harper's Magazine, American Art News, Outer's Book, and 35 weekly and monthly publications along religious and agricultural lines.

Mr. President, do we want to financially destroy all these publications? Do we want to destroy the 400 publications named in the list that I hold in my hand? I do not believe the Congress of the United States will think of doing so, and I know that if the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee is adopted it will destroy them. They can not pay the tax that will be imposed and exist.

Yesterday, in answer to a question that was asked by the Senator from Idaho in relation to the farm journals of the country, I made the statement that the profits of all the farm journals of this country for the year 1916 would not be sufficient to pay the tax imposed on second-class mail matter, providing the increase did not exceed 1 cent a pound. Now I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that I base that statement upon the following facts secured from the Treasury Department of the United States, taking every farm journal in the United States——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator restate that proposition? My attention was called away for a moment, and I did not hear it. I should be glad if he would restate the proposition.

Mr. SMOOT. I stated that if an increase of 1 cent per pound upon second-class mail matter were imposed in addition to the 1 cent of the present law it would take all of the profits of all of the farm journals of the United States, based upon what all of the farm journals of the United States made in the year 1916.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator, in answer to that, that the whole argument on this point is without any effect, because I have already agreed to accept an amendment to be offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] that will except all of those publications from any such rate.

Mr. SMOOT. Now the Senator begins to make exceptions in regard to certain lines of publications. I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in order to save the periodicals and publications of the United States in large numbers, the exception would have to go to every class of publication in the United States.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. I want to say that I agree with the Senator in that proposition. The law is not worth a cent if you have got to make exceptions to it, and it shows its injustice.

I will not vote for the proposition advanced by the Senator from Tennessee if he finds it necessary to bolster it with any such exceptions as those.

Let me say further to the Senator from Utah that the truth about this matter is that any reasonable adjustment of these rates can be made if these people are required, as advertisers generally throughout this country must be required, to adjust their business to whatever rates the Government does establish, as they have adjusted them to the present rates.

Mr. SMOOT. Nobody can deny the statement made by the Senator from Georgia. The very fact that the Senator from Tennessee admits that there must be exceptions made in the case of the amendment offered by him shows its utter weakness.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Quite the contrary. Inasmuch as under my amendment there is still about $70,000,000 that the great journals, like those issued by the Curtis Publishing Co., are getting from the Government as bounty, I am willing, in view of that fact, to put the farm journals and the labor journals on a slightly different footing; that is all.

Mr. SMOOT. The Curtis Publishing Co. can well afford not to object to the increase in second-class postage rates. Why? Because they know that if such rates are imposed as are proposed by the Senator they will drive out nearly all the competition they now have in the United States; and instead of charging $6,000 for a page advertisement for one issue, they believe that they can make more than the increase in postal rates out of the increase in advertising charges, because they will have the country almost entirely to themselves.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. If that is true, why do we not find the Curtis Publishing Co., and others in like condition with them, here fighting for this amendment rather than here fighting against it?

Mr. SMOOT. They are not fighting against an increase.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, yes; they are here fighting this particular amendment actively, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I am going to say to the Senate what happened before the committee when we had this question under consideration. Of all the publishers of the United States that appeared before the committee, the Curtis Publishing Co.'s representative was the only one who said that his company did not particularly care whether there was an increase or not.

Mr. HARDWICK. And, Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will yield to me, more than a year ago the Curtis Publishing Co. agreed to an increase more substantial than that proposed by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, they know as well as we know what it means to that company if they can drive out most of the competition in the United States; and I say now in this connection, so that the Senators may know, that the only way we can impose a tax upon the Curtis Publishing Co. for the use and privilege they enjoy of the second-class rate is by imposing the 5 per cent tax upon the net income of the corporation as provided for in the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. McCUMBER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield, and to whom?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield first to the Senator from Tennessee, and then I will yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McKELLAR. I just wanted to ask the Senator this question: If he feels as he does about the Curtis Publishing Co. and the other people, and they admit that they ought to pay higher rates, why does not the Senator offer an amendment here charging them the actual cost? I will vote for his amendment if he will offer one to that effect.

Mr. SMOOT. Even that kind of an amendment would not obviate the difficulties in which we find ourselves. The trouble is that we have built up this system; businesses have been established under it; and now, as I said yesterday, to pass a law over night changing the whole system means ruin to the weaker papers, and it means ultimate success to the papers that can stand it and have less competition and a practical monopoly in the United States for the future.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Right along that line let me ask the Senator this question: In view of the fact that these very great publications use the fast freight and other methods than the post office for moving their products from the place of publication to the point of distribution, and recalling, as the Senator undoubtedly will, the rather meager amount they would pay either under the present rates or under the rates proposed by the Senator from Tennessee, I want to ask the Senator if the committee amendment taxing them 5 per cent would not be a greater charge upon them than the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee and everybody else who has studied this question knows that the Curtis Publishing Co., whenever the express can be used cheaper than the mails, use it, and in a good many cases they send carloads by fast freight; and whenever the distance is such that the express company charges are more than the rates imposed by the Government, the Government can take the business, but not one pound when the express rate is less than that imposed by the Government on second-class mail matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like to call the Senator's attention to the record, which is this: I do not know how much the Curtis Publishing Co. use other means of transportation, but they got a "rake-off" from the Government because of having used the Government's means of transportation of four million and nearly eight hundred thousand dollars last year. I do not think anybody in the world, even the Curtis Publishing Co., would complain of not using the Government's transportation when they used it under such circumstances and with such magnificent profit as that.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I thought I had with me a statement from the Post Office Department showing the circulation of all the principal magazines in the United States, showing what percentage of their circulation went through the mail and what percentage was delivered by other means. I know, if the Senator has seen that report—and I think he has——

Mr. McKELLAR. I have seen it.

Mr. SMOOT (continuing). He has found that the Curtis Publishing Co. does not use the mails to exceed 40 per cent of its circulation.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that wherever it is profitable for the Curtis Publishing Co. to use the mail they use it, and wherever it is more profitable to use freight or express they use that, and they can not be blamed for it. But however that may be, whether it is 40 per cent or 30 per cent or 20 per cent, or whatever per cent it may be, the fact remains that the record shows that the Curtis Publishing Co. got $4,800,000 from the Government last year on account of these rates.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, Mr. President, I do not deny that; but when we are trying to reach the Curtis Publishing Co. and prevent them from receiving a bounty of $4,000,000 from Government rates, in doing so we would not want to cripple nearly half of the publications of the country, and perhaps more, and drive many of them to bankruptcy. Now, that must be patent to any Senator who has studied this question.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I interrupt just one other time to say to the Senator that I am certainly very greatly gratified to know of the moderation of the Curtis Publishing Co., that they use the mail only to the extent of 40 per cent of their circulation, and get only $4,800,000 out of the Government thereby. If they used it for the whole 100 per cent, according to the Senator, the amount of their bounty from the Government would be about $12,000,000, by a simple calculation; and I think he ought to be very grateful to the Curtis Publishing Co. because they use it only to the extent of 40 per cent instead of 100 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am never grateful to any corporation that saves the Government $1 while doing so makes for itself $3. The Curtis Publishing Co. would use the mails for every pound of its publications distributed if it could not find a cheaper way to distribute them. They find a cheaper way by sending their publications by express for a certain distance; they find a cheaper way by sending them by fast freight within a limited area; but when they go beyond those areas then the Government can carry them because of the fact that the mail costs less than they can get them distributed or carried for by any other means of transportation.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the senior Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. SHIELDS. If the Senator has the information, I should like to know the limits of the zones in which they use the express company because it is cheaper than the 1-cent rate of second-class mail.

Mr. SMOOT. That depends in certain cases upon whether there are many of the publications distributed. It can be said generally as to the first but not to the second and third zones.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. It might in the case of the second zone, I suppose.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes; I know the Senator will understand the statement that in the first two zones a flat rate is more costly to the Curtis Publishing Co.

Why? Because it is a 1-cent rate. Therefore, within those two zones, wherever it is possible, what does this company do, as well as all others in like situations? I am using this company merely as an illustration; I care nothing in the world about the Curtis Publishing Co., either one way or the other. I have no doubt they are delightful gentlemen. But wherever the rate is less—and that is within the 50 and 150 mile zones—they use either freight or street cars, or some other method of distribution, and the Government loses the postage.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wanted to be perfectly accurate in the statement I made, and therefore I qualified it in answering the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], because there are places where there are just a few subscribers where it is much cheaper for them to send the magazine by mail than to try to send it by some other means of transportation, even in the first zone.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, of course; but suppose they want to send magazines to Brooklyn or to Jersey City, or even to Philadelphia—it is cheaper then to send them by freight, and they send those magazines by freight. That is the truth about it.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator from Tennessee stated that the Curtis Publishing Co. was enjoying a bonus of something over $4,000,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Government states it as $4,800,000.

Mr. KELLOGG. Four million eight hundred thousand dollars. That assumes, of course, that they send all of their publications by mail, does it not?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator is mistaken. That is for just what they do send by mail. The Senator from Tennessee was right in his statement there.

Mr. KELLOGG. I wanted to understand it.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, Mr. President, take the 55 farm journals of this country. Their capital stock aggregates a little over $15,000,000. They made net profits in the year 1916 of $581,875.20. They paid for postage for the year 1916 $569,857.01. Do you tell me that the farm journals of this country can stand an increase of 1 cent on postage? Where would they get the money to pay the additional tax of $569,857 from?

In that connection, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the total amount of paper used by these publications in 1916 was 635,486 hundredweight. The average increase in the price the farm papers pay for their print paper to-day as compared with the year 1916 amounts to $1.007 per hundred. Now, do we want to drive all these papers out of existence? If so, adopt the pending amendment. And this is only one class of publications.

I have here, Mr. President, the sworn statements of some 30 publishing companies, selected from over a thousand that I have received, showing that in every case, if we only impose a cent a pound additional postage on second-class mail matter, they could not pay the increase out of their gains based upon the profits of 1916.

I am not going to take the time of the Senate to call attention to just what the losses would be; but if there is a Senator who wants to know exactly what they are, I shall be very pleased indeed to tell him. But just take into consideration the class of papers they are. These are some that I have selected out of the statements that they have rendered to me. They are such papers as the Christian Herald, the People's Home Journal, the National Farm Power, Today's Housewife, the Woman's Home Companion, the American Magazine, the Fireside, all of McClure's publications, the Modern Priscilla, McCall's Magazine, Harper & Bros.' publications, the Sunset Magazine; and so I could go on, Mr. President, and name not 20 or 30, but, as I say, I have here one list of over 400 publications in the United States that would find themselves in the same position as the ones I have named.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, after the Senator finishes discussing that question, and before he sits down, I should like to ask him one question.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator may ask a question at any time.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to ask the Senator this question: Since it has been developed that there is a zone in which these newspaper and magazine and other publishers ship their publications by freight or express rather than use the post office, because it is cheaper, does not that conclusively show that there is a zone in which the 1-cent rate pays for itself; and is not that zone just about what I have established? Is it not a fact that in a zone, say, of 300 miles, which is established in my amendment, the 1-cent rate just about pays for the cost of transportation and the other charges; and is it not conclusively shown that that is so by the fact that the publisher uses other methods of transportation within that zone?

Mr. SMOOT. No; there is not a single zone that pays the expenses of carrying second-class mail matter. There is a zone, and that the first zone, where the transportation will not amount to 1 cent per pound.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, the Senator is mistaken about that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SMOOT. I want the Senator to wait until I get through with my statement.

Mr. McKELLAR. All right.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, when you take into consideration the overhead expenses for maintaining the Post Office and divide it among the different zones the mails are transported to, and taking into consideration the weight and class of mail that goes within each zone, and charge to each zone the pro rata of overhead expense that the Post Office Department is under, there is not a single zone that would pay its way for transporting second-class mail matter.

Mr. President, that is shown in the different reports that have been made as to what it really costs for transporting second-class mail matter. Some of the reports which have been referred to to-day have simply taken into consideration what the transportation charges are. The Government has to pay the expenses of the Post Office Department. It has to administer all the postal laws, and they affect every zone; whether the first, second, or eighth zone, it makes no difference. The officials of the Post Office Department have to administer the law, no matter in what part of the country, and all overhead expenses must be paid, and they should be apportioned to all classes of mail delivered and pro rata to the amount handled.

Mr. WATSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question.

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator has named various magazines and newspapers. What would be the difference in the amount of postage collected for the transmission of those particular magazines or newspapers or publications through the mails under the McKellar system and the system provided by the committee? Can the Senator give an offhand estimate of the difference?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I have not that information. I could give it as a whole, not as to any one particular zone.

Mr. McKELLAR. If I may interrupt the Senator again, and I owe him an apology for having interrupted him so often——

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; no apology is necessary. What we want is to get at the facts.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the Post Office Department figure that there is a zone in which the service pays for itself; and I say that is absolutely established by the publications using other means of transportation in that zone, because they have the same overhead charges when they undertake to transport it by other means. They have got to pay the overhead charges as well as the transportation charges.

I call the Senator's attention to still another matter, that within this zone of 300 miles the actual cost of transportation is less than half; it is forty-eight one-hundredths. That leaves fifty-two one-hundredths for overhead charges within that zone. Of course after that, in further zones, the cost of transportation and the other overhead charges increase proportionately.

Mr. SMOOT. The overhead charges of the Post Office Department will be just the same if it transports all publications or whether it transports only half of them.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not agree to that at all. The overhead charge can not possibly be the same. Suppose the post-office business is just one-half of what it is, there can not be the slightest question that the overhead charges would not be the same.

Mr. SMOOT. We would have to have a Postmaster General and assistants, and would have to have the same number of post offices and the same number of clerks. We would have to have charwomen and laborers, and would have all the general expenses.

Mr. McKELLAR. Not as many of them.

Mr. SMOOT. All the expenses that we appropriate for now. The Senator knows there is seldom an appropriation bill in which the amount was decreased, no matter whether we lopped off a branch of the service or not.

Mr. McKELLAR. But our post-office service has increased every year.

Mr. SMOOT. I know the post-office service has increased.

Mr. McKELLAR. The business has increased.

Mr. SMOOT. The business has increased.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course.

Mr. SMOOT. And the overhead charges are just as high to-day in proportion to the amount of transportation of mail as they were years ago.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator will permit me, much of that service is gratuitous. I was here when we created the Rural Delivery Service. No one expected it to pay.

Mr. McKELLAR. It pays. The parcels alone pay $10,000,000 right now.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Rural Delivery Service does not pay and it never was intended to pay. When it was established it was a direct gift to the farmers of the country, and an appropriate one.

Mr. McKELLAR. Notwithstanding that, I have figures from the Post Office Department showing that the parcel-post business paid $10,000,000 last year, and that is rural service.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am not talking about the parcel post, I am talking about rural free delivery.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is entirely different.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is different because it deals with a class of people for whom Congress has great respect. But notwithstanding it is a gift and a bounty, and it was done to knit communities together and bring farmers into closer touch in the communities.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator from Utah will yield that I may answer, I will say that I will join with the Senator to do away with all gifts and all bounties. I think the sooner we get to the point where no bounties and no gifts are given to a particular class of our people the better we would be off.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Whenever we get to a point where we have no bounties and no gifts the country will have gone backward instead of forward.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the statement made by the Senator from Tennessee that the Post Office Department claims that there was a profit of $10,000,000 upon the parcel post is correct. But, Mr. President, whenever I see that report I can not help but think of some of the conditions that enabled such a result and wish it might have been otherwise. I know of dozens of men in my own State who have absolutely been financially ruined by the extra amount of parcel-post matter they have been compelled to carry under contracts they signed when they had no idea as to what the parcel-post business would amount to. They are not now carrying 50 pounds or 100 pounds occasionally, but they are compelled to carry parcel-post packages by the ton. I received a letter only the other day from a schoolmate of mine who signed a contract a short while ago for carrying the mail and parcel-post matter on a route in my home State, and there has been developed a business that he himself had no reason to expect nor no one knew about at the time. The amount of parcel post has increased so greatly on that route that there is nothing but financial ruin staring him in the face.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They carry sheep, goats, and babies.

Mr. SMOOT. They are carrying ore and flour and sugar.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And sheep.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know as to sheep.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I trespass on the Senator's time a moment more?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator we are carrying tons upon tons of second-class mail matter just as we are of parcel-post matter, the only difference being that the Government is making $10,000,000 a year profit on parcel post carried under the zone system and losing $89,000,000 carrying second-class mail matter for the publishers.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt but what the Government of the United States is losing money in carrying second-class matter, and every citizen of the United States has known it now for many, many years. I think the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] was happy in his statement the other day when he called attention to the reasons why it has not discontinued. But here we have a revenue bill, and it seems to me that this is not the proper time to undertake to adopt a system that we know before ever voting upon it that, if adopted, will ruin financially a great percentage of the publications of the country.

For that reason, Mr. President, I am going to vote against the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, and I trust that we have had enough Senators present in the discussion that they may know the situation, at least the way myself and other members of the committee view this question.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair. If the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Tennessee should be rejected by the Senate, would it then be in order to submit another amendment to the section?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would be in order at that time.

Mr. HARDWICK. I so understood from other expressions from the occupant of the Chair, that an amendment in the nature of a substitute would be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would be in order.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

Mr. STERLING. Before the Senator proceeds will he give me an opportunity to present an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, in order that it may be considered as a pending amendment?

Mr. HARDWICK. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. STERLING. I submit the amendment to the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota submits an amendment to the amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add the further additional proviso:

Provided further, That this section shall not apply to farm or religious newspapers and periodicals, nor to newspapers and periodicals entitled to be entered as second-class matter and maintained by and in the interest of religious, scientific, educational, philanthropic, agricultural, labor, or fraternal organizations or associations not organized for profit and none of the net income of which inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, just a word in reference to the amendment which I have offered. I ask that the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the words proposed to be inserted by the Senator from Tennessee, the following proviso:

Provided further, That this section shall not apply to farm or religious newspapers and periodicals nor to newspapers and periodicals entitled to be entered as second-class matter and maintained by and in the interest of religious, scientific, educational, philanthropic, agricultural, labor, or fraternal organizations or associations not organized for profit and none of the net income of which inures to the benefit of and private stockholder or individual, but that with respect to such publications the rates shall be as under existing law.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, under ordinary conditions I would be inclined to sympathize with the position taken by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and might support the proposition involved in his proposed substitute; but under existing conditions relating to the cost of print paper and the cost of labor, I can not feel that this substitute is just. I think it is, at the present time, an extreme position to take.

Much has been said about the bounty, or subsidy, given to the publishers of newspapers and periodicals under existing law. But, Mr. President, I do not regard the $70,000,000, if that be the amount of the Government's loss in carrying second-class mail matter, as altogether in the nature of a subsidy or bounty. If it is a subsidy or bounty, Mr. President, the public is the great beneficiary in the end; and I think the original policy adopted is, to a certain extent, at least, a wise and a beneficent policy, the idea being that information, instruction, knowledge, should be carried to the people through the medium of the newspaper and the periodical, even though it should be at some cost to the Government.

Mr. President, reference has been made in this debate to the rural delivery system and to the fact that the Government of the United States loses $40,000,000 a year because of the carriage of mails through rural delivery. But, Mr. President, do we regard that as a gratuity or as a subsidy, or a loss, I would rather say, on the whole to the people of the United States? Do we not think it is a highly beneficial institution and of great benefit to the public and well worth the expenditure of the $40,000,000 over and above the receipts from rural mail delivery?

Mr. President, I recall a statement made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] in his colloquy with the Senator from Georgia a while ago, in which the question was involved as to whether or not we were not granting subsidies to certain sections of the Union through the agricultural appropriation bills which we pass every year. In passing these bills we do not stop to consider whether the Government will get financial returns from the expenditures made every year for the purposes of investigations carried on under the general supervision of the Agricultural Department, through its Bureau of Plant Industry, its Bureau of Animal Industry, and through the other activities of that department. We say that the expenditure is warranted, that all farm demonstration work is warranted under the appropriations made for the Department of Agriculture.

So here, Mr. President, because of the permanent benefit to the public in the dissemination not of news simply, nor entertainment simply, but of knowledge and education, the Government is not in the end sustaining any loss. It is quite warranted in making something of an expenditure in this way to achieve so great an end.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to ask the Senator a question in regard to his amendment to the amendment. It just occurred to me when it was being read, and I sent to the desk and procured a copy of it, and I want to call the Senator's attention to it, that it provides in substance that this section shall not apply to certain papers. The section, as I understand it, if agreed to, would be the section that would provide for the payment of all second-class matter. If that section did not apply to the newspapers enumerated in the Senator's amendment, to what would it apply and at what rate would they then be carried?

Mr. STERLING. I do not know whether the Senator from Nebraska understands or not that my amendment is an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. And follows the section.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. My understanding of it would be that the law as it exists now with reference to second-class mail matter and with reference to this particular kind of second-class mail matter would apply. If it does not, I should want to modify the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the reason why I called the Senator's attention to it, not in any spirit of contention, certainly. I know the Senator does not want to carry these periodicals for nothing. If he will notice the substitute proposed by the Senator from Tennessee he will see that if it is adopted as section 1101 it provides as follows. I think the date has been changed to October.

On and after October 31, 1917—

It may have been changed to some other date, I do not know; but whatever the date it is immaterial for the purpose of this question—

That on and after October 31, 1917, all newspapers, magazines, and other publications regularly admitted to the mails as matter of the second class when mailed by publishers shall hereafter be subject to the following rates of postage:

The effect of the Senator's amendment, I fear, would be that this section would not apply to the class of publications he has enumerated in his amendment, and I fear there would be no law that would apply to them. If that is the case, they would not remain subject to admission as second-class publications. I may be mistaken about it, but would not that be the effect? It is a restatement of the law, as I understand it, as it exists now. As far as I have read it, it is simply a restatement of the present law. The effect of the Senator's amendment is that this section would not apply to the publications he has mentioned.

Mr. STERLING. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska I took it that the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee simply provided for a zone system, and that the zone system would not apply to the periodicals I have named in my amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator may be right. The idea just occurred to me as I listened to the reading of the amendment at the Clerk's desk—I have not looked it up—that the part of the amendment, as far as I have read it, is a restatement of the present law, and therefore it would be the law that would apply to second-class mail matter, and there would be no other way of having any publication admitted as second-class mail matter except under that law. If I am right in that theory, then the publications the Senator has mentioned in his amendment would not be entitled to the privilege of second-class matter.

Mr. STERLING. I may change the phraseology, if I have the time a little later, so that there can be no question about that. I am not sure but what the Senator from Nebraska is correct and there may be some ambiguity about it that ought to be cleared up.

But, Mr. President, I wish to speak with reference to the classes of publication covered by my proposed amendment. It will be seen from a reading of the amendment that there are in the main here two classes of publications—religious newspapers and periodicals—and it is provided by the amendment that the section shall not apply to them nor to the newspapers and periodicals entitled to be carried as second-class mail matter and maintained by and in the interest of religious, scientific, educational, philanthropic, agricultural, labor, or fraternal organizations or associations. With reference to the latter part of my amendment, excluding the general language in regard to farm or religious newspapers and periodicals, I have adopted the language of the House, the language which describes the publications not to be affected by the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

Now, with reference to the farm and religious journals, I think there can be no doubt from all the testimony that has been adduced in this discussion and from the assertions made again and again that the great majority of these publications will be carried at a loss in the event the amendment of the Senator from Georgia should prevail. I will just call attention to a telegram received from the Outlook. I do not think this telegram has been read into the RECORD, and I beg the privilege of reading it:

NEW YORK, August 24, 1917.

HON. THOMAS STERLING,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Any increase in the postal rate for second-class matter at this time would seriously cripple the Outlook, which is already burdened with heavy increase in cost of paper. We are pledged to deliver the Outlook to over 100,000 subscribers for many months to come at a yearly subscription rate fixed on basis of present postal cost, and a sudden increase in that cost will result in financial disaster to our business. We are not seeking to evade taxation, but, on the contrary, will gladly pay war taxes up to the limit of our financial ability.

FRANK C. HOYT,
Treasurer the Outlook Co.

I think that is fairly representative of the position taken by the religious journals and publications throughout the country in regard to this postal-rate question; they are journals published not primarily as a commercial enterprise at all, but primarily for religious discussion and instruction, and, secondarily, for the wholesome discussion of current events and policies they give, and often ably give, to the people of the United States or to all who read them.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator has just referred to the proposition to tax newspaper advertisements. I have been looking this report through, and I find that the Cosmopolitan Magazine has about 40 per cent of its columns in advertising. Munsey's has 10 per cent. Both magazines weigh the same. On the proposition to tax advertising it will give Munsey's three-fourths advantage over the Cosmopolitan.

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Take the Iron Age, which has 84 per cent of its columns in advertising, and that would be assessed eight times as much as Munsey's Magazine. That is not a fair or a just tax. It is a tax on an indefinite value, a tax paid to the Government. It is proposed by this amendment that the Government shall transmit a package of exactly the same weight, if it contains matter which it approves, while it penalizes another publication four times for the same privilege.

Mr. STERLING. Certainly. Nor has it appealed to me on that account.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. May I suggest to the Senator from South Dakota and also to the Senator from Michigan that the Iron Age and the Cosmopolitan each have it in their power, if they wish, to get in at the lower rate by simply taking the advertising matter out? The one that has the advertisements is the one most able to pay; the magazine that has not any advertisements is the least able to pay the Government.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator is right. A newspaper has just suspended in Chicago that has been in operation for several years which was trying to get along purely and simply with a subscription list and no advertisements at all. It cost several hundred thousand dollars for the experiment and lost all its work. If you want to reduce the number of periodicals and newspapers you can do it just as you put the State banks out of existence by taxation a few years ago.

Mr. STERLING. I have read the report made by one prominent religious journal. Let me take one of the other class, a farm journal, and read a short extract from a letter to Mr. KITCHIN of the House Ways and Means Committee, written to him in regard to the House proposal as to its effect on farm publication. The writer says:

In conclusion, Mr. KITCHIN, let me reiterate that low postage rates most positively do not constitute a subsidy to a special class of people, the publishers—not one bit more than low freight rates constitute a subsidy to another special class, the merchant; that the benefits are passed on to all the people; that the question is not whether the publishers of the Progressive Farmer should pay more for the postal service but whether the 170,000 farmers and farm families who take our papers should pay more for such service on the Progressive Farmer and other papers. Furthermore, I respectfully submit that the newspapers in addition to promoting the general spread of intelligence are right now serving the Government, as you are bound to know, in not unworthy ways, Mr. McAdoo himself declaring that it was the press that sold the Liberty Bonds to finance the war; in the Red Cross work the service of the press was not less notable; and to-day it is to the press that the Government directly appeals in calling to arms all the forces summoned for the defense of the Nation.

Is it right that such an industry, at a time when many of its members are being already threatened with ruin by a paper trust whose exactions the Government has not curbed—is it right that such an industry should be singled out for punishment beyond other industries; or is it not wiser and juster to listen to the appeal of the publishers when they say—

And this is what they say:

Tax the profits of the publishing business all you please. If any publisher is profiting unduly by the second-class postage privilege, if he is not passing on to the people the advantages of this service as the great majority of publishers are doing, then tax his profits as heavily as justice permits. But put your tax on profits rather than postage; in striking at the profits of a few do not destroy existence itself for the many.

With best wishes, I am,

Yours, sincerely, CLARENCE POE,
President and Editor the Progressive Farmer.

Mr. President, I must say these two expressions from these two great journals, the one a great religious journal and the other a great farm journal, appeal to me very strongly, and it is in behalf mainly of those two classes of journals that I have offered the amendment to the substitute offered by the Senator from Tennessee, and I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, there are a great many amendments pending to this question, and if the Committee of the Whole or the Senate could finally consent to strike out both the House provision and the Senate committee amendment, of course, if we could do that now, we could save a great deal of time in debating and voting on the various amendments. It will end very quickly if anybody objects, but I am going to ask unanimous consent that we may vote on the motion to strike out the House provision and also the Senate committee amendment for section 1201 of the bill. If that is not done the whole thing is open to amendment just as it is, but if we could get a vote on that and it is carried we could end all this debate and dispose of all these amendments.

Mr. LODGE. I would be glad to have the question disposed of as soon as possible, but I do not see how the Senator is going to reach it in that way. The situation is that the motion of the committee is to strike out and insert. That is not divisible.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It could not be done except by unanimous consent. I realize that.

Mr. LODGE. If that motion is voted down then, of course, the House provision remains to be dealt with.

Mr. TOWNSEND. And the committee amendment is left just as it is?

Mr. LODGE. No; if the committee amendment, the motion to strike out and insert, is defeated and the committee amendment is disagreed to all that remains is the House text, and then it is open to strike out and insert.

Mr. TOWNSEND. This is my request. I may be wrong about it. I ask unanimous consent to vote on the motion to strike out the House provision and the amendment of the Finance Committee.

Mr. LODGE. The only difficulty is that it is an impossible motion; that is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

Mr. SMOOT. I understood the Senator from Michigan to withdraw his request.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I did not withdraw it, but I understood there was objection to it.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. STERLING. Before the Senator from Massachusetts suggests the absence of a quorum, I should like to add some words to my amendment to clear up the ambiguity suggested by the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota has the right to perfect his amendment.

Mr. STERLING. I desire to add the words "but that with respect to such publications the rates shall be as under existing law."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota perfects his amendment in accordance with his statement.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harding	Lodge	Shields
Bankhead	Hardwick	McKellar	Simmons
Beckham	Hitchcock	McNary	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Hollis	Martin	Smith, Mich.
Brady	Husting	Nelson	Smoot
Brandegee	James	New	Sterling
Calder	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Stone
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Sutherland
Colt	Jones, N. Mex.	Page	Swanson
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Penrose	Townsend
Dillingham	Kellogg	Poindexter	Trammell
Fernald	Kendrick	Pomerene	Underwood
Fletcher	Kenyon	Ransdell	Vardaman
Frelinghuysen	Kirby	Saulsbury	Wadsworth
Gerry	Knox	Shafroth	Watson
Gore	La Follette	Sheppard	Weeks
Gronna	Lewis	Sherman	Wolcott

Mr. KIRBY. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] on public business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I announce the absence of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], and in his behalf ask unanimous consent to submit a telegram which he desires to have published in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee? There being none, the telegram will be inserted in the RECORD.

The telegram is as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., August 28, 1917.

HON. ROBERT L. OWEN,
The Senate, Washington, D. C.:

If the effort being made to impose a drastic and revolutionary tax upon periodicals succeeds, it will destroy many and seriously cripple most of the worth-while professional scientific trade and industrial publications. Our publishers gave the Government free of all cost over 4,000 pages of editorial and advertising matter on the liberty loan. They are working in close cooperation with every administrative department of the Federal Government and with many State governments. They raised 10,000 men for the New York National Guard and were officially thanked by the governor. Our papers are performing a vital service to both Government and industry.

A service of the heart as well as of the head and one that money could not buy. Our publications have been built up honorably and legally upon the basis of existing laws. The people of the entire United States get the benefit, and all the benefit, of the uniform 1-cent rate, and it is the people who will suffer if the effort prevails to overturn the long-standing policy of encouraging the dissemination of intelligence. The Government wants revenue, the Government wants and needs the kind of cooperation that is now being given in generous measures by the business papers, but it can get neither from a dead or sick publishing business. What will be gained by penalizing unselfish service by a staggering blow at this time? We ask you to appeal to the Senate in the name of good government, common-sense statesmanship, and the general welfare to leave us free to continue our invaluable service to industry, to trade, to science, and to the Government, a service that should command the unstinted support of every Senator who knows the facts.

THE ASSOCIATED BUSINESS PAPERS,
ARTHUR J. BALDWIN, President,
JESSE H. NEAL, Executive Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee as amended.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me that in dealing with the second-class mail matter the only just and fair way is to adopt a zone system. That plan is followed in dealing with practically everything else, although in the Post Office Department first-class mail matter is not subjected to a zone system. The reason that is not done, however, is because the weight of the letters is so small that the expense and the detail and inconvenience of charging according to a zone system would more than overbalance any advantage that might be derived. There are some other reasons, but that is sufficient reason, I think, why that system is not applied to such first-class mail.

We have, however, recognized the principle in the parcel post. The smallest article, the letter, is distributed all over the United States at a flat rate, but when we come to the transportation of something where weight is a material consideration, if we want to be just and fair, distance must be taken into consideration.

Second-class mail matter is loaded on the Government in carload lots—even, I presume, sometimes in trainload lots—and to say that we should transport it over the entire United States at a flat rate, seems to me, is to disregard every principle of transportation and every principle of justice and fairness.

It is attempted by the so-called Hardwick amendment to increase the rate but to still leave it a flat rate. It seems to me, Mr. President, that that will not be a practical law if it is passed. It is not subject, in my judgment, to a practical business administration. I think, if we increased the rates and they were so scientifically adjusted that all publications were shipped under them, the Government would be made whole, or practically so; we would still lose on the long shipments, and we would make enormous profits on the short shipments. To begin with, that kind of a system is not fair and just to the man who only uses the mails to ship his product a short distance, because it charges him a rate that is unreasonable and exorbitant. It is unfair to the Government where the distance is long, because the Government must perform a service for which it does not get a return. As a matter of practical operation, however, it will be worse than that. In practice it will mean that those who have second-class mail matter to send through the mails will be able to utilize express companies wherever the distance is so short that the express companies can make a profit on the transaction. They will utilize the mails wherever the distance is so great that the express companies will not carry it at the Government rate. The result will be that the Government will get the unprofitable end of the business and not get the profitable end of it. We have now a flat rate of 1 cent a pound all over the United States.

The service costs the Government a great deal more than that, as everybody knows. If we should make a rate of 5 cents and let it apply to the whole United States, the Government would then transport second-class mail matter only where the distance was so great that there would be a loss involved in carrying it, and the express companies would carry it, and very properly so, within all distances where they could make a profit.

I myself do not understand how we can meet the situation unless we apply the zone system, unless we are satisfied to carry it at a loss, or unless we are satisfied to carry the unprofitable part of it and to let the express companies do the business where there is a profit. It seems to me the only way out of it is to apply a zone system. For that reason I have for a great many years favored the adoption of some kind of a zone system.

The Senator from Tennessee has proposed an amendment, which is the pending amendment, establishing a zone system. It starts at 1 cent for the first three zones, I think, and then gradually increases the rate for the different zones until it reaches a rate of 6 cents a pound for the eighth zone.

Mr. President, while I am not an expert on the subject, it has always seemed to me that the Government ought to provide a lower rate for the first zone or two than is provided even in this amendment or than is provided by existing law, because I am informed—and I presume there is no dispute about it—that for the first zone, for the first several hundred miles, newspapers and periodicals now, though they can use the mails at 1 cent a pound, get a cheaper rate from the express companies and send by express, sometimes, I believe, for distances ranging from 100 to 250 and perhaps to 300 miles.

The Government ought not to make a profit out of the business. So far as I am concerned, I am willing that it should do the business at some loss, because I think there is a great deal in the argument that it is an educational proposition to a great extent, and the Government can afford to donate something for carrying on the system, but that we ought to donate from $70,000,000 to $80,000,000 I believe is wrong, particularly when some of the beneficiaries, some of the publications that cost the Government the most, are making large amounts of money out of the business.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], in behalf, as he says, of the Post Office Department, offers an amendment providing for a flat rate but differentiating between reading matter and advertising matter in newspapers and periodicals. It has always seemed to me that there was a great deal of reason for that differentiation. That kind of a law can be easily carried out and administered, but if we adopt the amendment that the Senator from Georgia first introduced at the suggestion of the Post Office Department, it would simply mean that on the long hauls the Government would get all the business and lose the business on the short hauls, where there would be a profit, and hence the deficit would be more than it is now. In other words, just as soon as you increase the rate and leave it a flat rate, the effect of such a change is simply to increase the distance within which the express companies can operate with a profit and to compel a situation whereby the Government will lose the profitable end of the business.

I was agreeably surprised to-day when the Senator from Georgia, who had offered the original amendment on behalf of the Post Office Department, came into the Senate and modified—or he says he will modify—in the way he has outlined the amendment offered on behalf of the Post Office Department, and he announces to us that it has the approval of the Post Office Department and that it has been worked out scientifically.

I want to congratulate the Post Office Department on having at last come around to the proposition that in order to have any practical amendment of the law that is at all fair or just we must come to a zone system. I hardly see why they should have been in the background so long or why the amendment which the Senator from Georgia now offers was not the one that he presented the other day on behalf of the Post Office Department. It makes me just a little bit suspicious of the Post Office Department's figures. If they have just been converted within the last few hours to the zone system and are now changing their ground and abandoning the flat-rate proposal and coming over at the last moment to the zone proposition, first having advocated a scientific flat-rate plan and the next day a scientific zone proposition that conflicts with the former, and that is entirely antagonistic to it, I confess it shakes my confidence somewhat in the experts of the Post Office Department. That was the reason why when the Senator from Georgia had the floor I wanted to ask him some questions in regard to the rates that he intends to provide in the new amendment which he has offered, but he declined to yield to me and I was unable to get the information from him.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. I just want to ask the Senator's pardon for not having yielded. It was a mere inadvertence. I wanted to finish a sentence just at that moment, and I intended to yield to the Senator later, and I forgot it.

Mr. NORRIS. I wanted to ask the Senator from Georgia, when I rose to interrupt him—and I followed him very closely, and he did not give the information at any time, at least as I understood it, that I wanted to get—this question: Why and how did the Post Office Department reach the conclusion that the rates he provides in the amendment that he is going to offer later are just; and would they in the first place yield a sufficient amount of money to pay the actual cost of the transportation of these magazines in these farther zones?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator let me answer his question now?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that the Post Office Department was unwilling ever to concede the proposition that there ought to be an abandonment of the principle of a flat rate on news matter. That was one reason why they insisted on presenting the proposition in the first form. They insist yet that the amendment I originally offered would have done absolute justice between the Government and the publishers as a whole, and would have entirely reimbursed the Government for all the money that it spends on this service, except that part of it that could properly be charged to the educational department of these publishers. But the Post Office Department does not contend that the rates in the amendment I last offered or last read to the Senate, which I intend to offer if I have the opportunity, would anything like compensate the Government for the loss on this class of mail. But the principle once established, they believe, will be worked out; and they regard it as important that we should start in some way or other to establish that principle; and they believe that even if we make a beginning that does not completely solve this question, its eventual solution along these lines will be certain, once we begin. Frankly, they present the proposition in a somewhat moderate way, hoping that it may find more favor in the Senate and be stronger than it would if it went at one bound to the extreme length that the necessities of the country and justice to the revenue might suggest.

Mr. NORRIS. Do I understand, then, that later they will recommend an increase of these rates?

Mr. HARDWICK. Eventually they expect to stand on the proposal that these rates ought to be so adjusted that on their advertising matter, at least on the business end of each one of these publications, each one of them shall pay its own way, wherever it goes and as far as it goes.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. President, there has not yet been given to the Senate anything but an estimate of the department, and that is probably all we could get. I am not finding fault with it, because the department just started out on this new amendment recently, as I understand. They had a different one yesterday. There has not yet been given to the Senate anything but an estimate as to how we are coming out financially if we enact these rates into law.

Let me say that I have a great deal of confidence in the proposition of differentiating between the news items and the advertising items. I want to say to the Senate that I have on my desk here an amendment that I prepared, and intended to offer in case the so-called McKellar amendment was defeated, to the substitute offered by the Senator from Georgia, which left the amendment of the Senator from Georgia just as it is in regard to the 1-cent rate, but put into it the zone rates for advertising matter provided for by the Senator from Tennessee; and I was very glad indeed when I found that the Senator from Georgia, with the approval of the Post Office Department, was himself going to propose an amendment like that and withdraw the other one. The thing, however, that rather induced me to look at it with suspicion, was the fact that the Post Office Department had so soon changed its front, although I was glad it had changed it; but naturally I was suspicious that probably the rates provided for in their amendment might do harm.

Mr. President, while I believe in the zone system, and always have, I have left to experts the fixing of the rates themselves. I do not believe we ought to take any chance here of fixing a rate that will be too high. I do not want to do any injury to any legitimate publication, and I have myself regarded the rates fixed in the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee as rather light. I thought probably we could go higher; but I was willing to accept them, because the amendment established the principle of a zone system, and after it had been in operation for a few years we could ascertain the effect of the rates. We will necessarily have to go to the experts of the Post Office Department, probably, to fix those rates; but when, without a moment's notice, they change front and bring in an amendment here that runs the rates up as high as 12 cents, I confess I was just a little fearful that the rates might be too high, and we ought not to make any mistake by making them too high.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. In addition to what the Senator has already said with reference to the Hardwick amendment, I call his attention to the rather astounding statement that was made by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] a few moments ago, calling attention to the difference in the amount of advertising in two magazines of substantially the same weight, to wit, the Cosmopolitan, 40 per cent of which is advertising matter; and the Munsey's Magazine, only 10 per cent of which is advertising matter. Now, the cost of carrying Munsey's Magazine through the mail is exactly the same as that of carrying the Cosmopolitan; and yet, if the Hardwick amendment should be adopted, the Government would get four times as much revenue from the Cosmopolitan as it would from the Munsey. Will the Senator say what his views are on that subject, in addition to what he has already said?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, of course, if we adopt the theory that the Government ought to carry at a flat rate, and only a nominal rate, matter that is not advertising, then that illustration falls to the ground, in my judgment, so far as having any weight is concerned. It is true that it would cost just as much to carry one as the other, and we would be getting more for one than the other; but the one would contain what the law would designate as educational matter while the other would contain a larger amount of what is simply advertising.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The subscriber must determine for himself what part of the contents is interesting. The law can not say what the contents of a magazine shall be or how it shall be presented. Oftentimes the advertisements are more interesting to the reader than the other matter.

Mr. NORRIS. That may be.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And not only that, if the Senator will pardon me, but these advertisements stimulate first-class mail. They result in increasing the income of the Post Office Department. For anyone to contend that the Iron Age, for instance, should pay eight times as much for exactly the same weight of package transported through the mails as Munsey's Magazine would pay, it seems to me, is ridiculous. It ought not in justice to be required to pay eight times as much for exactly the same privilege.

Mr. NORRIS. When the Senator takes that position, he does not differentiate between advertising matter and other reading matter. It depends on whether we decide to do that by the law. We can not make a magazine interesting by law, but we can provide that for the profitable part of it, for which the editor or the publisher gets paid, we will charge more nearly what it costs us to transport it than the balance of the magazine. We can do that by law.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator is entirely right. We can not make the magazine interesting by law, but we can put it out of business by law very quickly if we give an unfair advantage to its competitors.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and we can pay it a subsidy by law and keep it in business. Now, the question arises, How far should we go? The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], in his admirable argument a while ago, asked the Senator from Tennessee whether he would put the Youth's Companion out of business. Why, Mr. President, I think it would be very appropriate to answer that by asking another question: Shall we keep the Youth's Companion in business by the payment of money out of the Treasury of the United States? Now, it might be right to do it, but in my judgment we ought not to do it, at least not to the extent that we are doing it now.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, since the Senator has asked a question, I will reply.

Mr. NORRIS. I shall be glad to have the Senator's view.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator asks, Shall we pay what is practically a bounty to keep such a magazine in existence? Why, the Government of the United States spends millions of dollars every year to send in every direction speeches of lawyers made at bar conventions, speeches of diplomats, and publications of every kind, paying the entire cost, not only for the white paper but the postage as well, and it runs into millions of dollars every year, much of it not being read at all. Here is a publication, to which the Senator has just referred, which is helpful, which is conducive to better citizenship, which is appreciated around the home circle, which ought to have a tremendous influence upon the life of our citizens; and there is complaint because the Government does not make a profit out of that kind of service.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has not stated the proposition as I understand it. Nobody has complained that the Government ought to make a profit out of that publication or any other. Nobody has intimated such a thing. Nobody is contemplating such a thing. Nobody is proposing such a thing. The proposition on all sides is to carry that publication through the mails at a loss. The only difference is, there are those who believe that the Government ought not to lose as much in carrying it as it is now losing.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well——

Mr. NORRIS. I wish the Senator would let me answer him first, and then I will yield to him again. I should like to keep the floor a little while. Nobody wants to put any publication, particularly like the Youth's Companion, out of business, and yet I dare say if we had an appropriation bill under consideration, and it was proposed to give to the Youth's Companion $50,000, it would not get one vote in the Senate of the United States. Indirectly, that is what we do.

The Senator refers to the Iron Age. I had here in the Senate and called the Senate's attention to it a few months ago, and have it still in my office, a copy of the Iron Age that weighs a little over 4 pounds. I have forgotten the figures now, but there were seven or eight times as many pages of advertising matter as there were of reading matter in that copy, and some of the reading matter was of doubtful educational value, probably. It cost the Government of the United States, as I remember the figures now, to distribute that one issue something over $40,000. It got less than $1,000 for doing it. At the rates of advertising—$50 a page, as I remember—the publishers of that magazine made an immense amount of money out of it. Now, I have not any objections to their making money out of it, but it seems to me it is unreasonable to say to the Government of the United States: "You should expend this much money in distributing that publication all over the country when it costs you ten or twelve times as much to do the work as you are getting for doing it."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, there is an ideal magazine [exhibiting copy of CONGRESSIONAL RECORD]. There is not an inch of advertising matter in it. The Government circulates it, and pays for the white paper. I do not know how many people read it, but I have been led to believe that it is not read very generally, although it is full of very useful information.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I will take up that proposition. I anticipate that the Senator from Michigan will offer an amendment that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shall not be further published. In that way we shall cease to publish it. That might be a good proposition, and I do not know but that that would be right. As the Senator from Michigan suggests, we would not need any cloture rule then; but that is an indication that somebody reads it. The Senator from Michigan intimates that nobody does read it; and he referred in his first question to the speeches of doctors and lawyers being printed at public expense and sent over the country.

Mr. President, there are not very large numbers of speeches that are printed in that way. There are some printed and published at public expense and circulated through the country in the way the Senator suggests; and, Mr. President, I presume everybody here knows that it is wrong and ought not to be done to the extent, at least, that it is done. But is it any defense to one proposition that is wrong to offer another one that is likewise wrong?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska further yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. NORRIS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I hope the Senator from Nebraska did not understand me to suggest that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD ought to be abolished. I think the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is a very useful publication. The recorded word makes men a little more temperate in speech. I would not abolish it or do away with it, even if it does involve an expense to the Government; but if any private citizen undertook to print it for the returns he would get in dividends he would have to have a bounty from the Government or go out of business.

Mr. NORRIS. The first thing that would happen if a private citizen undertook to publish it would be that he would go into the advertising business or there would not be any publication of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, if advertisements would tend to popularize the publication they should be encouraged.

Mr. NORRIS. May I say these speeches, printed at public expense and circulated, contain no advertising matter? Nobody makes a financial profit out of the transaction.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Nobody except the individual who sometimes capitalizes it for campaign purposes.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true, but the individual editor sometimes capitalizes his newspaper and even the editor of a magazine can do the same thing without having any advertising in his paper in regard to it. I think that occurs very often.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; if the Senator will pardon me, it occurred just once within my recollection. The paper had been printed at Chicago for the last five or six years on the theory that news and editorials would carry its cost, and after an expense of several hundred thousand dollars it finally has been abandoned. The price of print paper put a quietus on that publication.

Mr. NORRIS. Even though it was getting a subsidy from the Government.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That was of little avail.

Mr. NORRIS. I say it had to be abandoned notwithstanding the fact that the Government was distributing it at less than cost.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It did not have as wide a circulation as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and cost less.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think the people are interested often in advertising matter. It is often interesting reading. But there is a distinction between an article in a magazine for which the magazine must pay the writer, for instance, a large sum of money on some educational or scientific subject that gives the value and the standing to the magazine. He pays even to get it, and on the next page there is advertising matter that may in itself be interesting that he gets paid for.

Although I am in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee, and I am going to vote for it, yet I think there is some reason in differentiating between advertising matter and other reading matter in a magazine and in a newspaper. I do not think the Government is under the same obligation to carry at an enormous loss the advertising pages of a publication that it is to carry the other reading matter that is in its nature educational.

The Senator referred to a paper that had no advertising and then made a reference to the effect that people take a paper and read it for its advertising. If we had a newspaper—and there are some such—that has nothing in it but advertising matter it would not have much standing. If it was not for the subsidy that the Government gives it it would not be carried through the mail. I went into a fourth-class post office in western Nebraska four or five years ago and talked with the postmaster. It was early in the season, when he had not found it necessary to keep a fire all day, and he said, "For several days I have been warming the office with newspapers." He showed me a whole sack of a certain publication that came from Augusta, Me., sent to men, he said, who were dead and gone or those who were not dead had moved out of the country. There was nobody to receive the papers. He had notified them and they did not pay any attention to it. Those papers came by the sack full clear across the country. It cost the Government an enormous amount of money to carry that worthless stuff, and then he used it for fuel.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. May I ask the Senator if in good conscience he does not believe that the advertisement of the liberty loan in the newspapers of this country did more to place that loan than anything that was done in its behalf? Millions of dollars' worth of advertising was given by the newspapers and magazines of the country for the liberty loan, and I noticed an article the other night that the Secretary of the Treasury was contemplating the expenditure of a vast sum of money to the newspapers to advertise the next liberty loan. Surely advertisements must amount to something. They are prepared often by experts at large salaries, and they go directly to the eyes of the people. The business house that does not keep a direct tab upon the results of its advertising is very lax. They know exactly what they get in return and buy it from choice. I do not like to have the idea go out that wholesome advertising is a useless process and that it is necessarily one that the Government should curtail and look upon with disfavor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan asked me a question and then he made a speech afterwards before I could get a chance to answer it, and I have forgotten what the question was.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If it were not for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD there would be no notice whatever of either the question or the answer.

Mr. NORRIS. But it would be too late to read it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for me to answer it. I wonder if the Senator himself has forgotten what it was.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I will tell the Senator what it was. I asked with reference to the service performed by newspapers, periodicals, and magazines in behalf of the liberty loan. The Senator from Nebraska, I think, is generous enough to concede that the newspapers and magazines performed a very great service to the Government in that crisis.

Mr. NORRIS. I remember it now, and the Senator's remark this time was so short that I could not have forgotten it. I do think they have performed a great service. The Senator must not get the idea that I have been condemning newspapers or have been condemning advertisements. There is not any such proposition before the Senate, and nobody is contemplating anything of the kind. I know they were patriotic; they did a great service then, and they have done it a good many times. Sometimes I think they take the wrong side of it when they mark me down as a traitor and a whole lot of other things, but they are entitled to their opinion and their judgment. Nobody is condemning them. I think they did a great service in the liberty loan, but, Mr. President, they did it without compensation. Are they coming now to get paid for it? Was it done with the idea of getting money for it? Did they think, "If we do this, Congress will continue to give us the subsidy which we have enjoyed for all these years?" If they did, there was a string to their patriotism.

Now, I do not think they did, and I am willing to give them credit for it. They are not the only people who were patriotic. There are thousands of men in this country who borrowed money to buy liberty bonds. They were patriotic. It is not a question of anybody's patriotism. Nobody has denied anyone's patriotism here. This question resolves itself down to this, Are we willing to continue to give to the newspapers and the journals and the magazines of the country a subsidy of from seventy to eighty million dollars a year, or do we want to cut that subsidy in two and to take away a part of it? Nobody has proposed to take it all away. Is it fair that the Government of the United States should continue to pay this enormous subsidy to a special class? Are the newspapers and the magazines of the country demanding that they shall be in a special class entitled to a subsidy from the taxpayers of the country out of the Treasury of the United States?

I will say in substance, in conclusion, it has seemed to me that we might well contribute something in the way of a subsidy, and we will if any of these amendments are adopted; but I do not believe it is right, I do not believe it is fair, to ask the taxpayers of the country to pay as a subsidy to these newspapers and magazines an amount of money from $70,000,000 to $80,000,000. The illustration I gave only shows that there are publications that maintain themselves for profit only on account of this subsidy. The fact that this postmaster out on the western plains was using a newspaper as fuel and could continue to do it and got enough of the papers to do it illustrates that they wanted to keep up with their advertising on the theory that they had a large list of subscribers, when, as a matter of fact, those people had never subscribed to such a publication, had never read it, and some of them had never seen it, and many of them had been dead and buried for years. I suppose the amount of their advertising depended upon the number of subscribers they had, and their books showed a whole lot of subscribers who in fact did not exist.

There ought to be a charge made somewhat commensurate with the service that is rendered. If the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee is adopted, we will still be giving a subsidy of between thirty and forty-five million dollars to these publications, but we will cut off some of it. It seems to me that that is fair. It takes into consideration the principle that the charge we shall make will depend somewhat upon the service we will perform, and it is a zone rate that we apply to everything else where weight is a material consideration in the transportation.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I understand the question now immediately before the Senate concerns the rate on second-class postal matter. I should like to be informed what, after this question is finally disposed of, will be the next question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next question would be the next section of the bill, unless some other amendment is moved to this section, which it would be in order to propose.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to say to the Senator from Missouri that the chairman having the bill in charge gave notice that we would take up title 2, the war-profits tax, as soon as this is disposed of.

Mr. STONE. As soon as the immediate matter before the Senate is disposed of?

Mr. SMOOT. No; as soon as the title now before the Senate is disposed of.

Mr. STONE. But I am asking with respect to the title before the Senate. I wish to be advised——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator will pardon the Chair, after the present section, which is section 1101, is disposed of, the next in order will be section 1102.

Mr. STONE. Well, what is section 1102?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Section 1101 is the one the Senator inquired about.

Mr. STONE. I ask what section 1102 is?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read section 1102.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 1102. That the rate of postage on daily newspapers, when the same are deposited in a letter-carrier office for delivery by its carriers, shall be the same as now provided by law.

Mr. STONE. That is enough. Then that follows the subject we are now considering.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; the temporary occupant of the chair is of that opinion.

Mr. STONE. I desire to know, because to-morrow morning when section 1102 is reached I desire to address the Senate upon the phases of the bill referring to newspapers. I am not giving this as any notice, except that I wanted to be sure that the provision of the bill relating to the tax on net incomes of newspapers would be the next subject taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That would be true if the regular order was followed.

Mr. STONE. If the regular order is followed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If it should be followed.

Mr. STONE. At all events, of course I must take some chance upon that, and it is not quite a chance with me. I simply wanted to know that, for I desire to address the Senate when that phase of the subject is taken up.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. HOLLIS. Will the Senator from New Mexico withhold the motion for just a moment?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Certainly.

Mr. HOLLIS. It is stated in some quarters that the four railroad brotherhoods do not object to the increased rate proposed. I desire to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, a letter addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Finance of the Senate and the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives by the four national legislative representatives of the four brotherhoods, in which they do object to the increase in postal rates.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUGUST 9, 1917.

Hon. F. M. SIMMONS,
Chairman Committee on Finance,
United States Senate, City.

Hon. CLAUDE KITCHIN,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives, City.

DEAR SIRS: As the representatives of approximately 500,000 citizens of the United States, who are members of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, the Order of Railway Conductors, and the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, and on behalf of nearly one and one-half million more, dependents of the men engaged in engine, train, and yard service in this country, we take this opportunity of calling to your attention the necessity of giving careful consideration to a matter of serious importance, and that is in reference to the proposed increase in postal rates.

During the year 1916 the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers directly, through their general offices, paid $3,414 for first-class postage, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen $7,669.70, the Order of Railway Conductors $9,025.65, and the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen $7,139, making a total for first-class postage paid by the general offices of those brotherhoods of $27,248.35. Under the proposed increase on letter postage of 50 per cent this would increase the expenses alone in the sum of $13,624.17 per year.

During the year 1916 the brotherhoods paid for postage in mailing their magazines the following amounts: The Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, $4,677; the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, $7,127.06; the Order of Railway Conductors, $2,484.06; the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, $6,717.63; total, $21,005.75. Under the proposed increase of 25 per cent on this class of postage to the expense of mailing the magazines would be added the sum of $5,241.44, thereby making a grand total increase of $18,865.61 in first and second class postage if the proposed increases were to become effective, bringing the grand total, based on 1916, up to $67,119.71 under the proposed increase of 50 per cent in first-class rates and 25 per cent in second-class rates (magazines).

The four railroad brotherhoods derive no income other than that paid for by the membership, and any increase in postal rates therefore must be paid for by the individual members. The magazines are the official publications of the four organizations and are maintained in the interest of the membership without profit for the mutual benefit and information of the membership.

The proposed increase in first-class postage is something that virtually affects every citizen of the United States, as through it communication is maintained among all the people; therefore, in addition to the amount of postage paid through the general offices, each individual member and the members of his family are directly affected by the increase in first-class postage rates, and a direct tax is levied on all the people in this manner, which amounts to many thousands of dollars to the men we represent and their families.

The B. of L. E., the B. of L. F. & E., the O. R. C., and the B. of R. T. deem it a patriotic duty to support the Government and to render every assistance in the prosecution of the war, with the end in view of a speedy termination of this conflict in the interest of humanity, and by word and action have pledged their loyalty to our country; but we, as the representatives of these people, feel that the burden of taxation should fall on those who are more able to pay than are the men who live on the wages they earn.

In the prosecution of this war, the war clause in the insurance policies carried by the members of these organizations has been suspended, and the insurance of members joining the military or naval forces of the United States as well as Canada is placed in full force and effect, and in this connection we desire to call attention to the fact that these brotherhoods have paid out in death and disability claims in the ordinary pursuit of the occupations of members the sum of $113,870,906.58 since the beginning of those organizations to July 1, 1917. To this enormous sum already paid and to the enormous amount of insurance in force will be added many thousands of dollars in war claims paid on account of death and disability of those who have volunteered or enlisted in the service of this country. Also, in connection with this, we desire to call your attention to the fact that every cent of this insurance is paid for by direct assessment upon the membership of these organizations, and that every cent paid for postage as well as for the publication of our magazines is paid for in like manner. Therefore, in the consideration of the pending war-revenue bill, we most earnestly request your consideration of the members of those organizations, with the object in view of lessening the burden of taxation to the greatest possible extent upon the men and their dependents represented by the undersigned, believing that other methods of raising revenue may be employed than that of increasing the postal rates.

Respectfully submitted.

H. E. WILLS,
A. G. C. E. and National Legislative Representative, B. of L. E.
P. J. MCNAMARA,
Vice President, National Legislative Representative, B. of L. F. & E.
N. M. CLARK,
Vice President, National Legislative Representative, O. R. C.
W. V. DOAK,
Vice President, National Legislative Representative, B. of R. T.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I offer an amendment to the pending bill and ask that it may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

RECESS.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m., Tuesday, August 28, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, August 29, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, August 28, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, let Thy blessing descend with all its quickening power upon these, Thy servants, that they may meet the great legislative problems which wait upon them wisely, conscientiously, patriotically, with statesman-like zeal, that ways and means may be provided for the prosecution of the conflict which is before us; that our soldiers and sailors may carry the flag of our fathers, and our flag, which represents all that is dear to the American heart, to a victory which shall establish a lasting peace for all the world; that righteousness, truth, justice, and liberty may obtain, and Thy name be hallowed in the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, August 24, 1917, was read and approved.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL THURSDAY, AUGUST 30, 1917.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet next Thursday. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does that mean that the gentleman's agreement, under which we have heretofore been operating, will be at an end?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; as I understand it. Notices have been sent to all the Members as to what legislation will be undertaken this week and next week. I would say that we hope to report the bond bill on Thursday and to take it up for consideration Friday and Saturday, although there may be some obstacles in the way. We have not reported it yet or fully considered it. Then it is understood that probably the soldiers' insurance bill will be reported Thursday. That will be taken up the latter part of the week or the first of next week. I hope the House will be able to adjourn over from Saturday until Tuesday for Labor Day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. FORDNEY, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of the bill (H. R. 9595), Sixty-second Congress, Joseph Neveaux, no adverse report having been made thereon.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 2156. An act to authorize exploration for and disposition of potassium; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has written me a letter asking indefinite leave of absence on account of sickness in his family. Is there objection to granting the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until Thursday, August 30, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication of the Secretary of War submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation to provide for the construction of defense roads and trails to localities on the Panama Canal, for the service of the fiscal year 1918 (H. Doc. No. 350); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of Commerce, relating to an estimate for standardizing governmental costs-accounting methods (H. Doc. No. 315, pt. 2); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, submitting a correction of an estimate of appropriation for payment of claim No. 31277 (H. Doc. No. 298, pt. 2); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. KNUTSON: A bill (H. R. 5839) extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River, in Aitkin County, Logan Township, State of Minnesota; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. LUNDEEN: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 145) to repeal an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," commonly known as the "conscription act"; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 146) authorizing the Secretary of War to proceed with the improvement of Willapa Harbor and River, Wash., in accordance with previous authorization of Congress; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Also, petition of the Rhode Island Mule Spinners' Association, No. 3, Pawtucket, R. I., approving the soldiers' insurance bill; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, August 29, 1917.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, August 15, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Chamberlain	Fernald	Hale
Bankhead	Colt	Fletcher	Harding
Beckham	Culberson	France	Hardwick
Brady	Curtis	Frelinghuysen	Hitchcock
Brandegee	Dillingham	Gerry	Husting
James	Lodge	Poindexter	Smoot
Johnson, Cal.	McCumber	Robinson	Sterling
Johnson, S. Dak.	McKellar	Saulsbury	Stone
Jones, N. Mex.	McNary	Shafroth	Sutherland
Jones, Wash.	Martin	Sheppard	Swanson
Kellogg	Nelson	Sherman	Thompson
Kendrick	New	Shields	Townsend
Kenyon	Norris	Simmons	Trammell
King	Overman	Smith, Ga.	Vardaman
Kirby	Page	Smith, Md.	Watson
Knox	Penrose	Smith, Mich.	Williams
La Follette	Pittman	Smith, S. C.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness. I will state that he is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is absent on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. My colleague [Mr. HUGHES] is absent owing to illness. This announcement will stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

THE PRESIDENT'S REPLY TO THE POPE'S PEACE PROPOSAL.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I have in my hand the reply of President Wilson to the suggestions of the Pope relative to the terms of peace. I am going to ask that this reply, together with an editorial and certain comments from the press, be printed in the RECORD. I do this for the reason that I believe it is a document that will go down in history and will mean much not only to the democracy of America but to the democracies of the world. While the President rejects the terms suggested by the Pope, yet he points a way that will enable the other nations, by following the lines suggested, to reach peace on fair, just, and honorable terms at the proper time.

I ask that these press comments, as well as the editorial, be published for the reason that I hope to have a page taken from the RECORD, printed, and distributed to the leading citizens in every county in my State, so that they may at first hand know what the immediate impression of this reply has been upon the people of the East. We of the West, of course, do not enjoy the advantages of reading all the great daily newspapers nor of reading the comments that they may make, and for that reason I ask to have inserted in the RECORD the editorial and comments of the press.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator include the editorial in the Post of this morning?

Mr. BRADY. I have included the editorial from the Post of this morning, and the comments of the press, the New York Herald, the New York World, the Times, and a few other leading papers.

I believe that this document is going to take its place in the world's history and in our history, as the generations go by, with Lincoln's Address at Gettysburg and Washington's Farewell Address to his soldiers and the people, for I believe that this document will cause us, when the proper time arrives, to have a seat at the table when the terms of peace are made. This reply of the President to the Pope is the beginning of the end of autocracy in the world.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Idaho will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PRESIDENT WILSON REJECTS POPE'S PEACE PROPOSAL—REPLY OF UNITED STATES TO COMMUNICATION FROM VATICAN TO THE BELLIGERENT GOVERNMENTS.

AUGUST 27, 1917.

To His Holiness BENEDICTUS XV, Pope:

In acknowledgment of the communication of your holiness to the belligerent peoples, dated August 1, 1917, the President of the United States requests me to transmit the following reply:

Every heart that has not been blinded and hardened by this terrible war must be touched by this moving appeal of His Holiness the Pope, must feel the dignity and force of the humane and generous motives which prompted it, and must fervently wish that we might take the path of peace he so persuasively points out. But it would be folly to take it if it does not in fact lead to the goal he proposes. Our response must be based upon the stern facts and upon nothing else. It is not a mere cessation of arms he desires; it is a stable and enduring peace. This agony must not be gone through with again, and it must be a matter of very sober judgment what will insure us against it.

His holiness, in substance, proposes that we return to the status quo bellum, and that then there be a general condonation, disarmament, and a concert of nations, based upon an acceptance of the principles of arbitration; that by a similar concert freedom of the seas be established; and that the territorial claims of France and Italy, the perplexing problems of the Balkan States, and the restitution of Poland be left to such conciliatory adjustments as may be possible in the new temper of such a peace, due regard being paid to the aspirations of the peoples whose political fortunes and affiliations will be involved.

It is manifest that no part of this program can be successfully carried out unless the restitution of status quo ante furnishes a firm and satisfactory basis for it. The object of this war is to deliver the free peoples of the world from the menace and the actual power of a vast military establishment controlled by an irresponsible government which, having secretly planned to dominate the world, proceeded to carry the plan out without regard either to the sacred obligations of treaty or the long-established practices and long-cherished principles of international action and honor; which chose its own time for the war; delivered its blow fiercely and suddenly; stopped at no barrier either of law or of mercy; swept a whole continent within the tide of blood—not the blood of soldiers only, but the blood of innocent women and children also and of the helpless poor; and now stands balked but not defeated, the enemy of four-fifths of the world. This power is not the German people. It is the ruthless master of the German people. It is no business of ours how that great people came under its control or submitted with temporary zest to the domination of its purpose; but it is our business to see to it that the history of the rest of the world is no longer left to its handling.

To deal with such a power by way of peace upon the plan proposed by His Holiness the Pope would, so far as we can see, involve a recuperation of its strength and a renewal of its policy; would make it necessary to create a permanent hostile combination of nations against the German people, who are its instruments; and would result in abandoning the new-born Russia to the intrigue, the manifold subtle interference, and the certain counter-revolution which would be attempted by all the malign influences to which the German Government has of late accustomed the world. Can peace be based upon a restitution of its power or upon any word of honor it could pledge in a treaty of settlement and accommodation?

Responsible statesmen must now everywhere see, if they never saw before, that no peace can rest securely upon political or economic restrictions meant to benefit some nations and cripple or embarrass others, upon vindictive action of any sort, or any kind of revenge or deliberate injury. The American people have suffered intolerable wrongs at the hands of the Imperial German Government, but they desire no reprisal upon the German people, who have themselves suffered all things in this war, which they did not choose. They believe that peace should rest upon the rights of peoples, not the rights of governments—the rights of peoples great or small, weak or powerful—their equal right to freedom and security and self-government and to a participation upon fair terms in the economic opportunities of the world—the German people, of course, included, if they will accept equality and not seek domination.

The test therefore of every plan of peace is this: Is it based upon the faith of all the peoples involved or merely upon the word of an ambitious and intriguing Government on the one hand and of a group of free peoples on the other? This is a test which goes to the root of the matter, and it is the test which must be applied.

The purposes of the United States in this war are known to the whole world—to every people to whom the truth has been permitted to come. They do not need to be stated again. We seek no material advantage of any kind. We believe that the intolerable wrongs done in this war by the furious and brutal power of the Imperial German Government ought to be repaired, but not at the expense of the sovereignty of any people—rather a vindication of the sovereignty both of those that are weak and of those that are strong. Punitive damages, the dismemberment of empires, the establishment of selfish and exclusive economic leagues, we deem inexpedient and in the end worse than futile, no proper basis for a peace of any kind, least of all for an enduring peace. That must be based upon justice and fairness and the common rights of mankind.

We can not take the word of the present rulers of Germany as a guaranty of anything that is to endure, unless explicitly supported by such conclusive evidence of the will and purpose of the German people themselves as the other peoples of the world would be justified in accepting. Without such guaranties treaties of settlement, agreements for disarmament, covenants to set up arbitration in the place of force, territorial adjustments, reconstitutions of small nations, if made with the German Government, no man, no nation could now depend on. We must await some new evidence of the purposes of the great peoples of the central powers. God grant it may be given soon and in a way to restore the confidence of all peoples everywhere in the faith of nations and the possibility of a covenanted peace.

ROBERT LANSING,
Secretary of State of the United States of America.

[From the Washington Post, Aug. 29, 1917.]

THE REPLY TO THE PEACE PROPOSAL.

Although President Wilson's reply to Pope Benedict's peace proposal is made after an exchange of views with the principal allied Governments, it is peculiarly America's views, and need not be considered in connection with the reply made by any other Government. The message ostensibly goes to Rome, but it is really directed to Berlin.

President Wilson lays bare the inherent weakness of any proposal to make peace on any terms with the German Government, this weakness being the inability of that Government to give any pledge or promise that other nations would accept. The German Government having destroyed its reputation for truth and honor, no one else can restore it. "We can not take the word of the present rulers of Germany as a guaranty of anything that is to endure." That tells the story in a nutshell, so far as peace negotiations are concerned.

How, then, shall peace finally be made? Mr. Wilson applies this test to every peace plan: Is it based upon the faith of all the peoples involved, or merely upon the word of an ambitious and intriguing Government? When the German people, speaking by and for themselves, pledge their faith, the world will discuss peace.

The President also makes it plain that there is no desire to "crush Germany," to destroy the sovereignty of the German people. He says a good word in season when he deprecates demands for "punitive damages, the dismemberment of empires, the establishment of selfish and exclusive economic leagues." He rightly states that these are not bases of peace of any kind, least of all an enduring peace.

There is the answer. It is for Germany to seek peace from within by setting aside the mad murderers who have run her toward ruin. When the people of Germany assert their control of their own affairs and make and operate their own Government, they can have peace by cleaning the blood from the hand they extend toward their neighbors. The cleansing process includes the restoration of stolen territory, restitution for property looted and destroyed, abandonment of attempts to govern alien peoples, acceptance of a status of equality among nations, and honest guaranties that there shall be no secret intriguing and secret arming for assaults upon other nations.

In short, the United States through President Wilson notifies Germany that the war will go on until evidence is given to the world, by defeat or inner reform, that Germany is no longer a maniac, but a peaceable neighbor.

The reply is the only one the President could have been expected to make. It gives renewed assurance, if any were needed at home and abroad, that the United States having entered upon the performance of a solemn duty to humanity, will continue unwavering until its task is completed.

The words are those of a great American into whose keeping the destinies of his country forced into war have been given. President Wilson by his calm, statesmanlike answer to the Pope's peace proposal once more proves his claim to the firm faith and confidence of his countrymen.

PRESS COMMENTS ON PRESIDENT'S REPLY TO POPE'S PEACE PROPOSALS.

New York Staats-Zeitung (German):

"President Wilson has rejected the Pope's peace proposals. This rejection was to be expected. The rejection is, however, neither brusque nor unconditional.

"The German people must speak. The nation itself, through its representatives, must make itself heard, must speak to the other peoples of the world; its voice will find a hearing; what it says will count. Thus peace will be possible."

New York Herold (German):

"To Mr. Wilson's view, all issues at stake can be quickly settled as soon as there exists a certainty that a democratic Germany has been born. Events in Germany appear to indicate that there are influences at work that may bring peace nearer than anyone now believes."

New York World:

"President Wilson's reply to the Vatican peace proposals can be compressed into five words: 'No peace with Prussian autocracy.'

"The President makes that issue fundamental. Everything can be left to compromise and adjustment except the safety and security of civilization. There must be guaranties for that, and there can be no guaranty while the present Government of Germany endures."

New York Times:

"To the Pope's proposal that the allies meet Germany in a friendly and mutually trustful negotiation, the President answers that there is no one to negotiate with. The negotiation results in scraps of paper. * * * The German people can save themselves by assuring our safety, by giving us men with whom we can negotiate. They can do it when they destroy their autocracy and give over its and their tyrannical ambitions."

New York Sun:

"In his answer to the Pope, President Wilson has hit the nail on the head.

"No peace can be made which allows the German Government to start anew; which leaves that part of Europe already crippled to hobble on unaided; which condones the wrong and only hopes to avoid it in the future.

"Could there be a sharper indictment than this: 'We can not take the word of the present rulers of Germany unless supported by * * * the will of the German people themselves'?"

New York Herald:

"President Wilson rejects the peace proposal of the Pope and, in language that will ring around the world, gives his reasons. There can be no truce with Prussianism, no temporizing with evil. Peace can not be based upon any such flimsy structure as the word of the present German Government."

Boston Herald:

"We believe the President has expressed, with admirable precision, the attitude of the American people in the present crisis; they want peace, but they want it on a basis that affords adequate assurance of its lasting. We believe the war is nearing an end—an end which will secure the future peace of the world. To yield just on the edge of such an accomplishment would be a prodigious mistake."

Boston Post:

"This reply meets expectations and forecasts; it is that which the President's utterances of recent months have made consistent; it reaches the very heart of the contention of this Government ever since the declaration of war."

Philadelphia Inquirer:

"If Germany herself will do the bidding of highwayman autocracy, well and good. If she will undertake to govern herself and destroy the military system that has for many years been a world menace, we, the countries fighting against that system, will be more than delighted."

Baltimore American:

"With full appreciation of the sincere and humanitarian motives that inspired the Pope, and sharing in his desire that the slaughter of men shall cease, this Government can not be a party to any peace proposals that would simply mean a renewal of the war and that would give Germany ample time to prepare for it."

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CURTIS:

A bill (S. 2824) for the relief of Joel J. Booth; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

A bill (S. 2825) granting an increase of pension to Jesse L. Pelton (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 2826) granting a pension to Catherine Walker (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 2827) granting an increase of pension to William R. Porter (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WATSON:

A bill (S. 2828) granting an increase of pension to Nancy Hackleman; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KIRBY:

A bill (S. 2829) to authorize the granting of furloughs to medical students in the Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. ROBINSON:

A bill (S. 2830) extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River between the cities of Little Rock and Argenta, Ark.; to the Committee on Commerce.

WAR REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] as amended.

Mr. KING. I offer an amendment to the pending bill in the nature of a substitute for sections 200 to 211, Title II, being the war-profits provision, which I ask may lie on the table and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I feel it a duty that I owe to the Senate and to the Post Office Department and to the country to express, at some length, although I am going to consume just as little time as possible, my views on this question, not with a view of expressing any opinion of my own except in so far as that opinion is the result of information that I have received from the Post Office Department and in so far as I believe that information to represent the truth about these matters.

One would think from this discussion that the propositions that we are discussing in the Senate, and have been discussing in the Senate since the consideration of this title was begun, were new and novel. Such is not the case. The very first postal law that this Republic ever passed, adopted, I think, in 1792—the act of February 1, 1792—provided a zone system of charges on letters, and during many years of the Republic's history the system of zone charges for this service, based on the distance that the letter or parcel or paper was transported, was the established legal policy of this country.

In 1874, however, the principle of a flat rate for the transportation of newspapers and periodicals was first recognized and established, and the act of 1879 extended the principle of a flat rate charge to letters; and that has been the continuing policy of this country up to the present moment, the precise rates now fixed by law on both first and second class matter being those carried in the law of 1885. I am not going to weary the Senate now with reading the various laws which record the changes in rates as well as the changes in policy which the Government has experienced on this question during its history. I will ask, however, consent to print in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a brief statement of the legislative history of this country with respect to postal rates both on first and second class mail, so that Senators may have this information and the country may have it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Georgia? There being none, leave is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the report of the Hughes Commission, pp. 56–61, inclusive.]

Letters: Under the first statute passed after the adoption of the Constitution (act of Feb. 20, 1792) the rates for single letters—that is, composed of a single sheet—were fixed according to distance, ranging from 6 cents for not exceeding 30 miles to 25 cents for over 450 miles, with double and triple rates for double and triple letters. These rates were not greatly altered for any long period of time until 1845. In that year the rate for single letters (defined as weighing not more than one-half ounce) for a distance under 300 miles was made 5 cents; otherwise 10 cents. In 1851 it was reduced to 3 cents for any distance not more than 3,000 miles, if prepaid, and 5 cents if not prepaid, with double rates for any greater distance. In 1855, prepayment was made compulsory, and the rate for more than 3,000 miles was increased to 10 cents. In 1863 a uniform rate of postage on letters was established, regardless of distance, at 3 cents for weight not exceeding one-half ounce, and this rate was continued by the general act of 1879. In 1883 it was reduced to 2 cents a half ounce, and in 1885 to 2 cents for each ounce or fraction thereof.

Newspapers, periodicals, etc. (1792–1845): By the act of 1792 the postal rates for newspapers were 1 cent each for not more than 100 miles and 1½ cents for greater distances. In 1794 there was added the proviso that the rate for single newspapers within the same State should not exceed 1 cent, and, further, "that where the mode of conveyance and the size of the mails will admit of it, magazines and pamphlets may be transported in the mails at 1 cent per sheet for conveyance any distance not exceeding 50 miles, 1½ cents for any distance over 50 miles and not exceeding 100, and 2 cents per sheet for any greater distance." In 1825, while the rate for newspapers was continued, that for magazines and pamphlets published periodically and mailed to subscribers was fixed at 1½ cents a sheet for any distance not more than 100 miles and 2½ cents for greater distances, and 4 and 6 cents, respectively, where they were not published periodically; and in 1827 there was a supplementary provision that where the magazine or pamphlet contained more than 24 pages on a royal sheet, or one of less size, the charge should be by the sheet, with one-half the rate for small pamphlets printed on a half or quarter sheet.

1845–1879: This continued until 1845. Between that year and the year 1879 there were numerous changes, involving many details, and we mention only some of the illustrative features of the legislation of that period.

The free privilege for newspapers was introduced in 1845. It applied to those not more than 1,900 square inches in size, distributed within 30 miles of the place of printing. This was withdrawn by the act of 1847, which, however, allowed free exchanges between publishers. In 1851 weekly newspapers, not over 3 ounces in weight, sent to bona fide subscribers were made free of postage within the county where published. This was restricted in 1852 to one copy to each subscriber, and in 1868 it was provided that these copies should be deposited in the office nearest the place of publication and that there should be no distribution by carriers save on payment of postage. In 1874 the free-in-county privilege was extended to all newspapers, save that unless postage paid they were not to be delivered at letter-carrier offices or distributed by carriers. In 1879, with the same restriction, this privilege was given to all second-class privilege.

Returning to newspapers and periodicals other than those made free, the act of 1845 continued the rates of 1825 for newspapers not more than 1 900 square inches. For those of larger size the same rate was fixed as on magazines and pamphlets, and the latter were charged 2½ cents a copy weighing not more than an ounce and 1 cent more for each additional ounce or fraction in excess of one-half ounce. Passing the provisions of the act of 1851, which were enforced for little more than a year, we come to that of 1852, which made the rate for newspapers, periodicals, and other printed matter weighing not over 3 ounces 1 cent to any part of the United States and 1 cent additional for each additional ounce or fraction thereof, with one-half this rate for those not over 1½ ounces circulated in the State where published. Small newspapers and periodicals published monthly or oftener, and pamphlets containing not more than 16 octavo pages each, when sent in single packages of at least 8 ounces to one address, were charged one-half cent per ounce or fraction thereof.

In 1863 mailable matter was divided into three classes: (1) Letters, (2) regular printed matter, (3) certain miscellaneous matter. The second class embraced all mailable matter exclusively in print, issued at stated periods. When issued weekly or oftener, not over 4 ounces in weight and sent to regular subscribers quarterly postage was charged running from 5 cents a quarter for weeklies to 35 cents for those issued seven times a week. For each additional 4 ounces or fraction thereof there was an additional rate. When issued less frequently than weekly, the rate was 1 cent a copy, not over 4 ounces, and small newspapers in packages to one adddress were charged the same rate per package. Transient second-class matter and third-class matter (except circulars and books) were charged 2 cents for each 4 ounces or fraction thereof in one package to one address; books, double; and unsealed circulars, 2 cents for three or less in number and proportionately for more.

In 1872 the quarterly rates on newspapers and periodicals were modified. And in that year there was provided a local-delivery rate of 1 cent each for newspapers (except weeklies), periodicals, and circulars not over 2 ounces in weight, and 2 cents for periodicals over 2 ounces when deposited in a letter-carrier office for delivery by the office or its carriers. By this statute third-class matter was made to include samples of merchandise not over 12 ounces, and all other articles not exceeding 4 pounds, which were not liable to injure the mails; and the third-class rate was 1 cent for each 2 ounces or fraction thereof; books, samples of metals, ores, minerals, and merchandise had double rates.

In 1874 there was introduced a pound rate for newspapers and periodicals mailed from a known office of publication or news agency to regular subscribers or news agents (save in case the local delivery rate was payable under the act of 1872). This was fixed at 2 cents a pound or fraction thereof for those issued weekly or more frequently; otherwise 3 cents. And the rate for all third-class matter was made 1 cent for each 2 ounces or fraction thereof.

The act of 1876 put "regular publications designed primarily for advertising purposes," or for circulation free or at nominal rates, under the third-class rate.

ACT OF MARCH 3, 1879.

The present law classifying mail matter was enacted in 1879. This established four classes: First, written matter; second, periodical publications; third, miscellaneous printed matter, and fourth, merchandise.

Mailable matter of the second class was defined as embracing all newspapers and other periodical publications which are issued at stated intervals and as frequently as four times a year, under specified conditions, as follows:

First. It must regularly be issued at stated intervals, as frequently as four times a year, and bear a date of issue, and be numbered consecutively.

Second. It must be issued from a known office of publication.

Third. It must be formed on printed paper sheets, without board, cloth, leather, or other substantial binding, such as distinguished printed books for preservation and periodical publications.

Fourth. It must be originated and published for the dissemination of information of a public character, or devoted to literature, the sciences, arts, or some special industry, and having a legitimate list of subscribers: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to admit to the second-class rate regular publications designed primarily for advertising purposes, or for free circulation, or for circulation at nominal rates.

The provisions as to rates on second-class matter were:

"SEC. 11. Publications of the second class, except as provided in section 25, when sent by the publisher thereof, and from the office of publication, including sample copies, or when sent from a news agency to actual subscribers thereto, or to other news agents, shall be entitled to transmission through the mails at 2 cents a pound or fraction thereof, such postage to be prepaid, as now provided by law."

"SEC. 25. That publications of the second class, one copy to each actual subscriber residing in the county where same are printed, in whole or in part, and published, shall go free through the mails; but the same shall not be delivered at letter-carrier boxes or distributed by carriers unless postage is paid thereon at the rate prescribed in section 13 (sic) of this act: Provided, That the rate of postage on newspapers, except weeklies, and periodicals not exceeding 2 ounces in weight, when the same are deposited in a letter-carrier office for delivery by its carriers, shall be uniform at 1 cent each; periodicals weighing more than 2 ounces shall be subject, when delivered by such carriers, to a postage of 2 cents each, and these rates shall be prepaid by stamps affixed."

Provision was made that foreign newspapers and other periodicals of the same general character as those admitted to the second class in the United States might, under the direction of the Postmaster General, be transmitted through the mails at the same rates as is published here. Further, all publishers of second-class matter were allowed, without paying extra postage, to fold within their regular issues a supplement, provided the added matter was germane; that is, supplied for sake of completeness.

Third-class matter embraced books, transient newspapers, and periodicals, circulars, and other matter wholly in print, proof sheets, corrected proof sheets, together with manuscript copy, and these were charged 1 cent for each 2 ounces or fraction thereof.

Fourth-class matter consisted of that which was not included in the other classes, not in the form or nature liable to injure the contents of the mail bag or harm those engaged in the Postal Service, and not exceeding 4 pounds in weight for each package (except in case of single books), and the rate was fixed at 1 cent an ounce or fraction thereof.

ACT OF JUNE 9, 1884.

By the act of June 9, 1884, the transient rate on newspapers and periodical publications of the second class—that is, when sent by others than the publisher or news agent—was made 1 cent for each 4 ounces or fraction thereof.

ACT OF MARCH 3, 1885.

In 1885 the pound rate for second-class matter was reduced to 1 cent a pound.

LATER STATUTES.

In 1894 the definition of publications entitled to be admitted to the mails as second-class matter was enlarged by the following provision with respect to those issued by benevolent or fraternal societies, trade-unions, and learned associations:

All periodical publications issued from a known place of publication at stated intervals and as frequently as four times a year by or under the auspices of a benevolent or fraternal society or order organized under the lodge system and having a bona fide membership of not less than 1,000 persons or by a regularly incorporated institution of learning or by or under the auspices of a trades-union, and all publications of strictly professional, literary, historical, or scientific societies, including the bulletins issued by the State boards of health, shall be admitted to the mails as second-class matter, and the postage shall be the same thereon as on other second-class matter and no more: Provided further, That such matter shall be originated and published to further the objects and purposes of such society, order, trades-union, or institution of learning, and shall be formed of printed paper sheets without board, cloth, leather, or other substantial binding such as distinguishes printed books for preservation from periodical publications.

Under this amendment we are advised that the department has uniformly held that the publications containing advertisements in the interest of other persons or concerns than the society or trades-union or institution of learning which the paper represents are not entitled to these privileges, and that to justify such advertisements there must be compliance with the conditions of the act of March 3, 1879.

There was a further supplementary act in 1900 with respect to the publications of State departments of agriculture, as follows:

All periodical publications issued from a known place of publication at stated intervals as frequently as four times a year by State departments of agriculture shall be admitted to the mails as second-class mail matter: Provided, That such matter shall be published for the purpose of furthering the objects of such departments: And provided further, That such publications shall not contain any advertising matter of any kind.

In 1910 it was provided that where publications mailed at the pound rate or free in county are undeliverable they shall be returnable to the publisher, after specified notice and in the circumstances stated, charged with postage at the third-class rate.

EXISTING RATES ON SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

The existing rates on second-class matter are those established by the act of 1879, as amended in 1884 and 1885. There are, in the words of the Postmaster General, "seven rates, or variations of rates, applicable to different circumstances," as follows:

(1) The general rate of 1 cent a pound on copies mailed by publishers to subscribers, to news agents, and as sample copies.

(2) The free-of-postage rate on copies mailed to subscribers residing in the county where the publications are printed and published when not addressed for delivery at a city letter-carrier office.

(3) The cent-a-pound rate on copies mailed for delivery by rural carriers when emanating from a city letter-carrier office.

(4) The cent-a-pound rate on weekly publications mailed for delivery at a city letter-carrier office.

(5) The cent-a-copy rate for newspapers, other than weeklies, and for periodicals not exceeding 2 ounces in weight, when deposited in a city letter-carrier office for local delivery by carriers.

(6) The rate of 2 cents a copy for periodicals exceeding 2 ounces in weight when deposited at a city letter-carrier office for local delivery by carriers.

(7) The rate of 1 cent for each 4 ounces for copies mailed by others than publishers or news agents.

Mr. HARDWICK. What I started to say on this subject is this: We have tried the zone system and we have tried the flat-rate system both with respect to first-class matter and with respect to second-class matter. We finally came to the present flat-rate system for the one reason that it was considered absolutely necessary, if democratic institutions were to be perpetuated and maintained, that education should be generally diffused among the people, and that the press of the country especially should have something like a national spirit. This country was so vast, its conditions were so different and diverse, that if there was to be created and maintained anything like a spirit of national unity it must come from some movement originating in the press and reflected by it. Those policies are sound, those principles are correct, and to their application to this situation no Senator who has given the question intelligent thought can enter his dissent.

But I must invite the attention of the Senate and of the country to the fact that since the year 1885, when the present rates were fixed by law, this country has undergone a remarkable business transformation. At that time, according to a table that I shall print in connection with my remarks, which has been carefully prepared by the Post Office authorities, not 5 per cent of all the newspaper publications in this country, magazines or what not, was advertising matter. It was less than 5 per cent.

Since 1884, however, the remarkable development of American business has been reflected in the newspaper and magazine world, and to-day many of these periodicals are nothing in the world but business enterprises, or largely so, as shown by the following table:

I have on my desk a number of specimens illustrating that development. Here is the Dry Goods Economist, one of the last issues, a journal of the dry goods trade, published in New York, entered as second-class mailing matter. It is nothing in the world but advertising, pictures, all sorts of fancy looking things, everything in the world except information, unless you count information about how to spend your money on dry goods and styles as important information. So I might go through the category of all these trade journals, and to some extent most of the farm journals as well, and also most of the journals that represent almost every specialized line of industry and business, and the same thing is true.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me finish this statement and then I will yield to the Senator. The table I shall present—but I will not weary the patience of the Senate to read from it now unless some Senator requests it—shows that in instance after instance this stuff that goes through the mails is a large per cent advertisement. Gentlemen, that is a perversion of the principle upon which we gave the publishers a purely nominal rate.

The following tables show this condition:

I now yield to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator, of course, has selected from among all the publications the one publication whose percentage of advertising to other matter is greatest. There are only one or two others of that class.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator has the table I used before the Senate committee?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; I have the table here.

Mr. HARDWICK. Is it the one I used before the Senate committee?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think it is.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator may read from it. It is just what I am going to do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would be glad to hand it to the Senator, except I wish to call attention to the fact that 71 per cent of the Drygoods Journal is advertising, but there are scores of journals, like the Furniture Manufacturer and Artisan, of Grand Rapids, Mich., 42.39 per cent of which is advertising, and so on.

Mr. HARDWICK. There can be no question between the Senator and myself about that. Of course, I used an extreme illustration. I have the table here now. I am going to show the Senator what that is, as long as the Senator raised the question, and if the Senator from Michigan has not raised it himself he will be astounded to know how the second-class mail privilege is being abused along that line.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am no apologist for the present system. I found it when I came, and it has been maintained ever since, not by my vote but in spite if it.

Mr. HARDWICK. And we ought to do all we can to remedy it.

Mr. SHIELDS. I desire to ask the Senator what is the nature of the circulation of the class of publications he is now referring to? Are they general throughout the United States or at least in several States?

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, yes; trade journals like that are sent to every important city in the country. So it is with the mining journals; so it is with the Lumberman's Journal; so it is with every one of these journals devoted to certain special lines of industry or business.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wished to know whether they would ordinarily come within what is known as the third zone or 300 miles?

Mr. HARDWICK. They would circulate in that, to some extent, but that would be a very small part of the circulation. They go all over the United States and to its remotest corners, and at the expense of the Post Office Department that is handling this sort of stuff as educational at a charge of one-eighth of what it costs to handle it.

Now, let us see. The Senator spoke of percentages. I have them here, and I will be glad to furnish them. I will take first the class known as religious magazines. They have the smallest percentage. The Christian Herald, for instance, has 14.2 per cent only of advertising. I will take some of the more ordinary magazines. Collier's Weekly, a high-class weekly, has only 15.9 per cent; the Literary Digest, 12.8 per cent; the Youth's Companion, 21.2 per cent advertising; the Ladies' Home Journal, and I believe that is the smallest of all, 8.6 per cent; the American Magazine, that is just a little under it, 8.4 per cent; the Delineator, 12 per cent; Everybody's, 53.4 per cent; Review of Reviews, 14 per cent; Woman's Home Companion, 14.8 per cent.

Now a few weekly papers. The Rutherford Republican, Rutherford, N J., 35.12 per cent; the Stoutsville Journal, Stoutsville, Mo., 56.25 per cent; the Woodson Beacon, Woodson, Tex., 62.5 per cent; the Fryeburg Post, Portland, Me., 32.14 per cent; and so with that class of papers.

Now let us take a few of the daily newspapers and see what per cent of their columns is devoted to advertising matter, and what do we find? The Times, Los Angeles, Cal., 46.11 per cent advertising; the Examiner, San Francisco, Cal., 48.37 per cent; the Post, Denver, Colo., 19.6 per cent; the Constitution, Atlanta, Ga., 50.51 per cent; the Tribune, Chicago, Ill., 62.5 per cent advertising; and so on I can go through the daily papers.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Take Munsey's, with only 10 per cent.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; that is one of the low ones.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is very low. It goes all over the country.

Mr. HARDWICK. So I can go through with the other journals. Take some of the great religious papers. The Baptist and Commoner, Little Rock, Ark., 16.40 per cent; Signs of the Times, Mountain View, Cal., 5.20 per cent. You will see that these religious publications, as a rule, are lower.

Now, take some of the trade publications. Printers' Ink, New York, 58.01 per cent; Fourth Estate, New York, 35.54 per cent; the Farm Implement News, Chicago, 56.81 per cent; the Concrete and Cement Age, Detroit, Mich., in the Senator's State, 62.38 per cent advertising; the Automobile Dealer and Repairer, New York, 67.94 per cent; the Automobile Trade Journal, Philadelphia, 68.52 per cent; the Horseless Age, New York, 79.28 per cent; and so on.

Mr. President, it is perfectly apparent to any man who wants to approach this question candidly, and I know every Senator of the United States wishes to do that, that we must do one thing if we are going to solve it right. If we are prepared to maintain the position, and I am for one, that this Government ought to continue the policy of charging only a very nominal rate for the transportation and handling of newspapers, magazines, and other publications that really represent intelligence and news, then we must separate the business enterprises that I have enumerated, and many more that infest the country, from this policy. How can you do it? Some Senator may suggest that every one of these papers, daily, weekly, and monthly, contains reading matter as well as news matter, and that it is impossible to separate the two for rate-making purposes. I say you can do it, and I say it on the authority of the Post Office Department, because that department has done it with a foot rule.

You can take a rule and you can measure column after column and page after page of space in these publications, and you can tell when you get through how many inches of space in each paper, magazine, or journal have been devoted to advertising matter and how much has been devoted to reading matter. When you average that through enough issues, then you can get a stable and reliable balance; and that is just how the figures which I have quoted and put into the RECORD were obtained.

Well, then what? Where are we then? I say keep your present rate, low as it is, nominal and no more, representing something like one-eighth or even, if the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] should be right, one-fourth of the cost of rendering the service, for all of these newspapers, magazines, and other publications, or for so much of them as are really carrying out the purpose for which this policy was created and is maintained; in other words, allow the present flat rate of 1 cent per pound or fraction thereof to be kept on all the reading and educational matter; but when it comes to the advertising part of each one of these publications, whether it is daily, whether it is weekly, or whether it is monthly, whether it is a trade journal or whether it is a religious journal—because if it is a religious journal and carries advertisements to that extent it is a business proposition, and the same is true as well of the trade journal and of the daily or weekly paper—as to each one of these papers apply a higher rate for handling the advertising matter, a rate that in the end, if we are honest men and good business men, will produce what it costs the Government to render the service, so that no man, whether he is running a daily or a weekly or a monthly newspaper, a magazine or other publication, whether his publication is religious, whether it is a farm journal, or whether it is a trade journal, or whether it is a magazine of fiction, shall be permitted to put his hands into the Public Treasury and to take out of it the money that belongs to the people of the United States and which is raised from them by taxation, by getting from the Government service for a purely commercial enterprise at a mere fraction of its cost.

This is the last citadel of special privilege, so far as this Government is concerned. No other business enterprise enjoys a bounty or subsidy from the Government, and this bounty ought not to be continued.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It was represented to the Finance Committee that until the low rate of 1 cent per pound upon second-class matter was fixed by the law of 1885—I believe the Senator gave it as 1884——

Mr. HARDWICK. 1885 is right. I accept the Senator's correction with pleasure.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That the deficit in the postal revenues as compared with the expenses was quite large, but that after that time the quantity of second-class matter materially increased, and notwithstanding that on the per pound basis the second-class matter was carried at a loss, yet by reason of the increase in first-class postage, resulting from correspondence emanating from the advertising matter sent out under the second-class rate, there was a balancing of the general revenues and expenditures of the Government. I should like to know the views of the Senator from Georgia upon that.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will give them to the Senator with pleasure. Those have been the representations and that has been the position of the men who have secured this bounty from the Government from time immemorial, or ever since the bounty began, and the Senator will find, if he will examine the report of the most careful and the most thorough and the most accurate commission that ever investigated this question, that that same contention was made before the Hughes Commission some years ago; but the Hughes Commission reported—I can not undertake to lay my hands at the moment upon the language of the report, but I will undertake to do it later if any Senator desires—that there was no way on earth of telling what the truth of that was; that claim and counterclaim were so vague, so indefinite, and so general that there was no way of determining that question. To some extent, of course, I believe only as to a very small per cent of the whole business, that may be true; but I say to the Senator as my opinion, resulting from some study of this question, that it is not true to an extent that is appreciable enough to influence anybody's action about this matter or on this question. It is worth remembering, also, that the largest postal deficit in the entire history of the country was in 1907, while the present rates were, of course, in operation.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield further to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. In a brief which was presented to the Finance Committee there is quite a large number of illustrations of first-class postage resulting from different advertisements in different periodicals, and, of course, the bald fact seems to appear that before we had second-class matter carried at a cheap rate there was a deficit in the postal revenues, taken as a whole, whereas since we have had the second-class matter carried at a cheap rate and the more the second-class matter increases at the cheap rate the nearer together the receipts and disbursements have come.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, I think those two things are related just about as much as the fact that we are alive to-day, and if we look out toward the moon can see what we commonly term "the man in the moon." I do not think there is the slightest relation between the two. These men have always made such specious contentions as these, suggested by their self-interest. I remind the Senator that at the same time the rates on second-class matter were lowered so were the rates on first-class matter; and it is just as reasonable, and far more reasonable, to conclude that the reduction in the rate that we charge on letters induced the increase in the volume of the first-class mail and the increase in postal revenues. That is the contention advanced everywhere by the postal authorities, and no postal authority who is disinterested ever paid any serious attention to any such theory as these publishers now advance in their own interest, and as they have advanced for some time in their own interest, in respect to this particular matter.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRADY. Will it annoy the Senator if I should ask him for an explanation relative to some items in the tables from which he has just read?

Mr. HARDWICK. No; not at all.

Mr. BRADY. I will read just a portion of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. I ask the Senator not to read from the printed amendment, because that is not the one I am going to present to the Senate.

Mr. BRADY. I think it covers the same rate of postage.

Mr. HARDWICK. Very well.

Mr. BRADY. It reads:

That the rates of postage on publications entered as second-class matter, including sample copies to the extent of 10 per cent of the weight of copies mailed to subscribers during the calendar year, when sent by the publisher thereof from the office of publication, or when sent by a news agent to actual subscribers thereto, or to other news agents for the purpose of sale, until June 30, 1918, shall be 1 cent a pound or fraction thereof for the portion of the publication devoted to reading matter other than advertising, and 3 cents a pound or fraction thereof for the portion devoted to advertising.

Is that the amendment of the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HARDWICK. It is not the one I am going to present now. I will come to that question in just a moment.

Mr. BRADY. When the Senator does, I should like to have him offer an explanation as to some parts of the table from which he has been reading, for I will say I am perplexed as to just exactly what the result will be.

Mr. HARDWICK. I shall be very glad to accommodate the Senator, and I will do so with pleasure in just a moment.

Now, Mr. President, so far so good. I think any man who has studied the question, who has given any consideration to it, must concede that if it is practicable to do it—and the post-office people say it is—we ought to separate these two rates. We ought to charge one rate—a lower rate, a nominal rate—for the real intelligence and the real news that goes to the public, and we ought to charge another rate—a higher rate, a compensatory rate; a rate, if you please, that will make the Government whole—on the purely commercial business features of these publications. It can be done, as I have explained, with a foot rule and with a little careful attention to the details of these papers through a few issues.

The rates in the original amendment suggested by me, which was approved by the department, would have made the Government whole at the end of the period of readjustment extending through four steps and through a period of three years. When the maximum had been reached the Treasury of the United States would have been practically whole. Whatever deficit had been caused by this class of mail matter would have been caused purely and simply and solely because of the policy with respect to educational and news matter, to which I have adverted and referred; but I admit and concede that while the amendment was accomplishing that result it would have left inequalities, the realization of which has been growing on me steadily and strongly day after day and hour after hour, between the publishers themselves, in striking an average, between the Government and the publishers as a whole, and because we did treat the publishers as a whole we would necessarily have ignored and overlooked individual inequalities. So the Post Office Department has been driven, and I have been driven, to the conclusion that when it comes to handling this commercial part of the proposition the best thing to do is to apply to it some sort of a zone system; in other words, when we consider ourselves, as we are, carriers of merchandise, carriers of freight for hire, if you please, with respect to this matter, that we ought to charge according to the service we render each individual publication, according to what it costs us to render that service, as nearly as it can be estimated and systematized. Of course, in order to do that we must consider not only the overhead charges but the distance that we transport the merchandise.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator, I presume, has the same information as some of the rest of us, that newspapers and periodicals could not exist were it not for the advertisements which they carry; that from the advertisements they obtain their chief revenue; and if you do anything to discourage advertising and carrying that through the mail, would you not necessarily increase the cost of information and intelligence to the public?

Mr. HARDWICK. I will be very glad to do so. I intend to address myself to that subject presently; but, of course, it is not directly related to this question, and, if the Senator will pardon me, I will come to it in a few minutes.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Very well.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now, bearing these general principles in mind, the officers of the Post Office Department, the experts who have been engaged for months on this labor, have finally prepared at my request an amendment which I intend to propose, if the Senate gives me the opportunity to do it by rejecting the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, as an alternative to that amendment; and I hope the Senator from Tennessee will be able to accept it because if he really earnestly wants to accomplish what he has expressed himself to-day on this floor and yesterday as favoring, he will certainly support a logical and general application of this principle. You must remember that the House of Representatives in dealing with this question dealt with it from the basis of a zone rate, but they applied the zone rates to reading matter as well as to advertising matter, to the educational side as well as to the business side of this question, and in that way rendered it difficult if not impossible for periodicals that carry very little advertising and that are almost wholly educational, like the religious journals and some of the great weekly and monthly periodicals, to circulate from one end of this country to the other without a prohibitive increase in postal rates.

Now, here is the proposition which I hope the Senator from Tennessee will be able to accept, but which in any event I intend to offer, if I get the opportunity, as an alternative to the proposal he has made. Substitute for the amendment proposed by the committee for section 1101 the following:

That the rates of postage on publications entered as second-class matter, including sample copies to the extent of 10 per cent of the weight of copies mailed to subscribers during the calendar year, when sent by the publisher thereof from the office of publication or when sent by a news agent to actual subscribers therefor—

All this is a repetition of the existing law and regulations—or to other news agents for the purpose of sale, shall be 1 cent a pound or a fraction thereof for the proportion of the publication devoted to reading matter other than advertising, and for that portion devoted to advertising the rate per pound or fraction of 1 pound for the delivery within the several zones applicable to fourth-class mail shall be as follows: From December 1, 1917—

It would be impracticable for the department to begin to adjust itself to this plan at an earlier date than that, and I do not know how much earlier than that this bill will pass—

From December 1, 1917, to June 30, 1918, for the first and second zones 1 cent—

That is on advertising matter as well as on reading matter, within a distance of 150 miles from the post office of entry, and surely that is liberal enough for every local publication in this country—

For the third zone, 1½ cents; for the fourth zone, 1¾ cents; for the fifth zone, 2¼ cents; for the sixth zone, 2¾ cents; for the seventh zone, 3¼ cents; and for the eighth zone, 3¾ cents.

That is the first step.

From July 1, 1918, to June 30, 1919, for the first and second zones 1 cent, for the third zone 1½ cents—

Increasing a quarter of a cent—

for the fourth zone 2½ cents—

An increase of a quarter of a cent again—for the fifth zone 3½ cents, for the sixth zone 4½ cents, for the seventh zone 5½ cents, for the eighth zone 6½ cents; from July 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, for the first and second zones 1 cent, for the third zone 1¾ cents, for the fourth zone 3¼ cents, for the fifth zone 4¾ cents, for the sixth zone 6¼ cents, for the seventh zone 7¾ cents, for the eighth zone 9¼ cents; from July 1, 1920, and thereafter—

Here is the permanent fixed rate now—for the first and second zones 1 cent, for the third zone 2 cents, for the fourth zone 4 cents, for the fifth zone 6 cents, for the sixth zone 8 cents, for the seventh zone 10 cents, and for the eighth zone 12 cents.

This would give a period of readjustment extending through more than three years, with four successive and regularly graduated steps. The Senator from Utah in the course of his very strong argument on this question said that these papers would not be able to survive if the rates were doubled. So they would not, unless their advertising rates were increased. The publishers of this country complain plaintively, continuously, and persistently to this body and to the other House of Congress that no action with respect to these matters ought to be taken, even though they admit the grievous injustice that has been done and is being done to the Public Treasury and to the people of this country by existing law, because they say they have already suffered so much from the increased price of print paper that this is no time to require any further exactions of them.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator, of course.

Mr. SMOOT. Does not the Senator believe that it would be much fairer if his amendment provided that its provisions should take effect a year later than the date he has named?

Mr. HARDWICK. A year later than December, 1917?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; say, on December 31, 1918. Would not that be very much fairer? Then the successive steps of increase——

Mr. HARDWICK. Would be postponed a year, of course.

Mr. SMOOT. They would be postponed a year.

Mr. HARDWICK. I thought about that, and so did the department, but we did not think it right to ask to defer the plan that long, because the increase in the first year is hardly as much as the committee's proposal, as I will show later; in other words, the first step in the increase is so small that the publishers can meet it without the slightest trouble.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I was just going to ask the Senator if he would give us the figures as to the revenue that would be raised under his proposal.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will do that in a few moments. I desire now to give a short explanation of the amendment. It leaves all reading matter at a flat rate of 1 cent a pound or fraction thereof, regardless of distance. Any man in this country who wants to run a paper purely educational, purely religious, purely news matter, can send it to the remotest corner of the Republic for this purely nominal rate, if he keeps it entirely that sort of a paper. The Senator from New Mexico suggests that he can not do it without advertisements and run the paper. Granted; but to the extent that he perverts the original purpose, to the extent that he combines the business end of his enterprise with the public purpose that is to be served, to that extent at least he ought to be made to pay what it costs the Government to handle his business, and I am sure the Senator himself must think so. Now, let us see. The amendment then provides zone rates on advertising matter on a graduated scale over a period of four years. The basis of the zone rates is the difference in each case between the present rate of 1 cent per pound and the parcel-post rates for the respective zones. This is worked out in the same way that the parcel-post rates were worked out, and based exactly on the same computations and plan, and covers practically only the transportation charges; in this latter respect only the plan differs from that employed in the parcel-post rates.

The Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Utah lay great stress upon the extravagant estimates of the loss from second-class matter made by the present administration of the Post Office Department, and, for that matter, they might just as well have said by all other administrations of the department, including those when their own party administered the affairs of the Government, because there is no difference between any of them along that line. These two Senators have stated that these estimates were extravagant. In preparing this proposal the Post Office Department has not added a single thing, as it ought to have been done, I think, for overhead charges, but is simply undertaking to ask that these people shall pay what it costs actually to transport their goods, wares, and merchandise.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The business end of it, without reference to reading matter.

Mr. HARDWICK. The "business end of it," in other words, as my colleague suggests. These differences are as follows: First and second zones—that is, for 150 miles—1 cent on everything, reading matter and advertising matter alike. Third zone, 2 cents.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What is the distance in that zone?

Mr. HARDWICK. The third zone is up to 300 miles. The fourth zone, 4 cents; the fifth zone, 6 cents; the sixth zone, 8 cents; the seventh zone, 10 cents; and the eighth zone, 12 cents.

You might say these rates are pretty high for the distant zones. So they ought to be, because newspapers and magazines, daily, weekly, or monthly, that are largely made up of advertising, have no business circulating at great expense to the Government in the far distant parts of the country; or, if they wish to do so, ought to do so without burden to the Treasury.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask the Senator if these rates have been carefully worked out by the department, and whether they are in all respects approved by the department?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir; they were furnished me by the department, and I am presenting this proposal at the request of the Postmaster General.

Mr. PAGE. And the department is in full accord with every rate the Senator has named?

Mr. HARDWICK. With every rate I have named and with every statement I have made.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico, if the Senator from Tennessee will pardon me for a moment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I wanted to get the Senator's view upon the suggestion that was made to some members of the committee, and doubtless has occurred to the Senator, regarding the advisability of having advertisements pass through the mail. It has been argued that advertisements going all over the country carry very important information and to a very great extent serve the same purpose as reading matter; that they tend to unify the country in the use of the same costumes, the same kind of clothing; that they give to the whole country information as to any new industrial device that may be put upon the market; and that advertisements themselves are largely educational and serve a very substantial purpose in unifying the country, letting all the people know what is going on in the rest of the country, and giving the people throughout the country the advantage of anything new that may be put upon the market.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, the suggestion is interesting if not wholly accurate. Of course trade and commerce and profit tend to unify the country and to bring the sections closer together, but the trading and profiting ought not to be transacted at the expense of the Government or out of the Public Treasury. When it gets down to that basis it is just as well for trade to pay its own way. Of course it might be educational, in a very far-fetched way, if the Senator would come down my way, for him to engage in a few horse trades; he would certainly learn something; and I presume if I went West and bought a few mines I likewise would learn something. All these things may be educational in a very indirect way, but it is not a way that is direct enough to warrant the payment for them out of the Public Treasury, in my judgment. If the argument of the Senator from New Mexico is sound, why should not all circular matter, upon which the rate of 1 cent per 2 ounces is charged, be handled at the same rate as these publications?

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PAGE. Just a word. Is the Senator quite certain that all of these advertisements do not tend to stimulate and produce a very vast commerce throughout the entire country and in that way benefit——

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly; I am not opposing the advertising business at all; all I am saying is that it must pay its own way. There is no reason for giving it a Government bounty.

Mr. PAGE. Is there not possibly an indirect benefit coming to the people, to the public, that more than offsets the loss sustained?

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, no. If you say that class of mail matter should be carried by the Government at such a tremendous loss because it stimulates trade, why should we not pay a part of the freight bills of the country, because the people profit by trading with each other and indirectly the Government benefits and the country is strengthened?

Mr. PAGE. I simply want to have the opinion of the Senator about that.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is my view. When you go out into that indirect field there is no stopping at all. Why would it not be advisable, then, for the Government to contribute a part of the freight rates and passenger rates and steamboat rates to get the people to travel or goods to be transported from State to State or to foreign countries, because indirectly the country would be benefited and the Government strengthened, and the net result of it would be an advantage.

Mr. PAGE. Can the Senator not go further and say the Postal Service would be benefited? Will there not be enough more letters written on account of advertisements to make up the loss involved in carrying them through the mails?

Mr. HARDWICK. I have already discussed that. I do not think so, and nobody else thinks so, except now and then you find a publisher who has enough temerity to make that claim.

Mr. HITCHCOCK and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield, and to whom?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am rather drawn to conclude, from what the Senator says, that he does not think the Government should in any case contribute without charge to the promotion of any line of American activity.

Mr. HARDWICK. I did not say that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, the Senator thinks that the Government should be paid absolutely for all the service that it renders to the people of the country.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; I have not said that. On the contrary, I have admitted that we ought to give the newspaper men a tremendous bounty as long as they confine themselves to the dissemination of educational matter.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator said a few moments ago that they ought to pay for the service.

Mr. HARDWICK. I said when they were making money out of it, and nothing but money—when it was a commercial proposition and no more—when it was advertising, that it ought to pay its own way; but I also said in the same breath, as the Senator knows if he did me the honor to listen to my argument, that that part of it which was educational ought to be carried at the purely nominal rate for which it is now carried, although it does not represent one-eighth of the cost of the service.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator knows that it is not possible to carry the educational part, or the part dealing with the spread of intelligence, without advertising.

Mr. HARDWICK. Ah, but you can separate the two, in so far as the rates are concerned, at least.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me finish. The Senator knows, if he knows anything at all about the business, that advertising is as necessary to the subscriber as it is to the publisher. The Senator ought to know, if he know anything about the publishing business, that every dollar the publisher receives from advertising is a dollar less that he levies upon the subscriber for subscriptions; so I say that he can not separate the two. The advertising is necessary to the life of the publication, and it is for the benefit of the reader. It is the papers which derive large revenues from advertising that render the greatest service to their readers. Now, the Senator has indicated that the Government should not render this educational service to the people with payment for it.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; the Senator can not——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What does the Senator say about the activities of the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I decline to yield further to the Senator just now. The Senator can not misrepresent the Senator from Georgia in his own time after the Senator from Georgia has repeatedly stated what he did say, not with my consent, at least.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator restate it and let me hear it?

Mr. HARDWICK. There is some limit to my physical endurance. I have stated it a dozen times this afternoon. I am fond of the Senator personally, however, and I will undertake to restate it again for him.

I said that I was perfectly willing for the news matter, the editorial matter, the reading matter, everything else except that which was purely advertising, the part of it that was done strictly for profit and to make money out of—the pure business end of it—to keep the nominal rate of one-eighth of what it costs us to give the service, although I realize that it is a bounty, and that the reason why I was willing to allow that was because there was a correct governmental policy back of it; but that surely that argument——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then the Senator would be willing, if the newspapers did away with advertising altogether, to have the Government pay the newspapers a bounty for circulating the reading matter? Because they would have to. If they do not get it out of the Government, they have to get it out of the advertising. The expenses have got to be paid, and the reader can not pay them. But now I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the Senator himself, and particularly his colleague from Georgia, have been very active here in asking heavy subsidies from the Government of the United States, through the Agricultural Department, for the agriculturists of his region——

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In connection with farm-demonstration work——

Mr. HARDWICK. Again, Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska can not misrepresent the junior Senator from Georgia in the time of the junior Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator is right about the senior Senator from Georgia, but not as to the junior Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. The junior Senator from Georgia has made no such effort. He has participated in no such movement.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, then, the other Senator from Georgia has.

Mr. HARDWICK. The senior Senator from Georgia is fully able to take care of himself, and can answer in his own time any assault of that sort that may be made on him. But, so far as the junior Senator from Georgia is concerned, he is not guilty; and no man, not even my friend from Nebraska, can charge it with any degree of accuracy, at least.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, now will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes. I want to let the Senator from Nebraska finish, however. I just wanted to stop him at that one point. I do not want him, while he is speaking in my time, to put me in an incorrect position, and I know he does not want to do it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Do I understand that the Senator did not vote for that proposition?

Mr. HARDWICK. What proposition?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The proposition to carry on the great work of the Department of Agriculture, which costs the United States millions of dollars a year, for the promotion of agriculture, particularly in the South?

Mr. HARDWICK. No; not particularly in the South.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. For the development of agriculture?

Mr. HARDWICK. No.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. For adding to the profits of agriculture?

Mr. HARDWICK. No; not particularly in the South.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, it was particularly in the South.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; I think there was just about as much of it in the West as anywhere else.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; the West is independent. It does not need it.

Mr. HARDWICK. So is the South; but let me say to the Senator from Nebraska—because I will not be diverted from this argument by any such stuff as that—that my record on this question is consistent. The "Senator from Georgia" has not participated in those raids upon the Treasury.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Has not the Senator voted for it?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not recall ever having seen an issue raised as to the passage of an Agricultural appropriation bill, but I will say to the Senator that most of them have contained many things I did not approve.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if my colleague will allow me, I desire to say that my colleague and I have disagreed on that subject.

Mr. HARDWICK. Very radically.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He has frequently, in my opinion, voted against measures in the interests of agriculture that he ought to have supported.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then do I understand the junior Senator from Georgia——

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I decline to yield further for any such interruption as this. I congratulate my colleague on his disinterested devotion to the cause of agriculture.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will yield if it is something related to the pending question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator think his constituents ought to pay for that service that is now being rendered?

Mr. HARDWICK. I think they get fully as much socialistic service from that department as they ought to get, and more than I should like to see them get.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator would favor charging them for it, then?

Mr. HARDWICK. No; I would favor the enactment of less of it.

Let me say at this point that I may not know as much about the publishing business as my distinguished friend from Nebraska, who has some interests along that line and some experience in it; but at least, Mr. President, I have no thought, no purpose, no desire at any rate, to do anything except what is right; and yet, somehow or other, I can not to save my life understand how it is that men who have great interests of this sort, publishers of all sorts, whether they publish daily papers or weekly or monthly magazines, can expect us to take all their views on these matters without a grain of salt, and not to understand fully how to make allowance where "Self the wavering balance shakes."

I now yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in answer to a question asked by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] a few moments ago, the Senator from Georgia said that his amendment was approved and upheld and stood for by the Post Office Department. I am sure the Senator will be fair enough to state that the Post Office Department has the same attitude toward the zone amendment that was offered by me, and the Postmaster General and the First Assistant Postmaster General have both given to my amendment also their hearty approval. In other words, they want the zone system. They are perfectly willing to take whichever one the Senate adopts.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; as a matter of fact, the Senator, I think——

Mr. McKELLAR. They have so stated to me to-day, and that is the reason why I asked the Senator to make the correction.

Mr. HARDWICK. The amendment I suggest is the proposal of the department. The Senator, of course, does not want to get the question improperly before the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I just want to get exactly the facts.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think I know the exact facts. I have been in conference to-day with the Postmaster General about this thing. I went there early this morning, as soon as I could get my breakfast. This amendment was drawn by him, or under his supervision, after a conference with me. He does not favor the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee, although I think he thinks it would be a little better than existing law, but very little at that. Now, that is the truth. The truth is the proposal of the Senator from Tennessee is nothing more nor less than the proposal of the Southeastern Publishers' Association, drafted by their employee and agent. The proposal I present is the proposal of the Post Office Department of your Government.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HARDWICK. Not yet, if the Senator will pardon me.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] calls my attention to the fact that according to the newspaper reports the Postmaster General opposed the House proposal, and I know that in the letter I read he said he had not favored it. I know his view, and I think I do not misrepresent him when I say that he thinks almost any one of these things is some improvement on what they have; but you can not hold him responsible for the Southeastern Publishers' Association proposition.

When the Senator from Georgia says he is presenting these things at the request of the Postmaster General and for the Post Office Department, the Senator from Georgia offers the letter of the Postmaster General, written to a great committee of this body, announcing that fact and saying that this plan, the separation of the two classes of published matter, was the only logical plan. The Postmaster General could not have written the letter that he wrote to the Senate committee on this proposal, saying, as he did, that a separation of this rate between the advertising matter and the reading matter was the only logical treatment of this question, and still favor very much the proposal of the Senator from Tennessee. He might favor it as I favor it myself, as somewhat better than the Senate committee's amendment, or than existing law. It is not as good as the proposal of the House, and it is not as scientific; and the Senator demonstrated that this morning, when, under the fire of sharp attack, the only answer he could make was to say: "Well, I will except certain publications from the operation of my law." If your law is right, you do not need to except anybody from its operation. It is a complete demonstration when, under the assaults of the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] had to say:

> Well, I will not make this apply to the farm journals and the religious journals of the country.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator, according to his own statement about his own amendment, excepts every publisher who deals with news merely.

Mr. HARDWICK. Ah! That is a distinction based on the very basic principle on which all this service rests. It is not a distinction that is to be made for a class, and a class that is engaged in making money out of advertising as much as anybody else. If the Senator undertook to say that he would make an exception in favor of religious papers that did not carry advertising, in favor of farm journals that did not make a profit out of the advertising business, just as much as anybody else, then I could understand it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment further?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. McKELLAR. The necessary and absolute result of the Senator's proposition, if his amendment is adopted, is to say to the publishers of this country who publish journals with no advertising connected with them: "You shall be exempt from anything except a flat-rate tax which is merely nominal."

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly; and that is the very theory on which this branch of the Postal Service has always been operated.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator ought not to jump on some one else, though, for doing the same thing that the Senator is doing.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am afraid I can not make the Senator from Tennessee understand my position. Education is the basis on which this policy rests. To confine it to that, strictly, is not a selfish exemption because you want to favor somebody.

The Postmaster General says that the principle which is contained in the amendment I present is basic and fundamental, and that no solution of this question can be reached that does not contain it. The Postmaster General, I know, and all the experts of the Department, think that the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee is a little better than existing law, but that it is no permanent cure at all for the evils of this situation.

Now, let us see. What will this amendment do?

From December 1, 1917, to June 30, 1918, the department figures that it will raise $8,141,120. That is for December, January, February, March, April, May, June—seven months. In other words, the increase for the year will be just about that proposed by the Senate Committee on Finance, the steps are so gradual, and we begin so conservatively. The second year, when the second step is taken, from July 1, 1918, to June 30, 1919, it will raise $16,528,885, or a little over $5,000,000 more than is now raised by law. When the third step is taken, from July 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, it will raise $19,097,563—something like seven and a half or eight million dollars more than we raise under the present second-class law. When the fourth and last step is taken, and thereafter, unless the rates are subsequently increased, it will raise, from July 1, 1920, to June 30, 1921, $21,674,241—almost double what we raise now.

Even then, Mr. President, the deficit will be heavy. Even then the bounty will be large. It is my hope, and I do not hesitate to express it—it is my belief, and I firmly avow it—that once we get this correct and righteous principle written into the law it will be a matter of easy adjustment to soon wipe out the most of this bounty.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, under the last year in which the increases are made and under the 12-cent rate that the Senator proposes——

Mr. HARDWICK. That is for the eighth zone.

Mr. McKELLAR (continuing). The eighth zone, the 12-cent rate, which is the last rate that the Senator fixes in his amendment, what will be the loss to the Government when that takes place?

Mr. HARDWICK. It will not be nearly as great as it is now, and it will not be nearly as great as it would be under the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. What would it be?

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, what would it be under the Senator's proposition?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have stated it very frequently, but I will state it again.

Mr. HARDWICK. I did not hear it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mine only raises $12,500,000, but it establishes the zone system.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, yes. In other words, the Senator's amendment would raise a million more, according to his statement, than we raised before. Mine, or the department amendment, raises $10,000,000 more than we raised before. Neither one of them raises enough; and the principal reason I am against the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee is that it dabbles with this question simply for the purpose of putting it off. I do not mean that that is his purpose. It temporizes with the question. It proposes what appears to be an increase, but what in reality and in substance is so little of an increase that none of the publishers care much about it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will just say to the Senator that I have the figures from the Post Office Department showing that it will be an increase of $12,600,000.

Mr. HARDWICK. An increase of that much?

Mr. McKELLAR. An increase of $12,600,000.

Mr. HARDWICK. I misunderstood the Senator, then.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, of course.

Mr. HARDWICK. I thought the Senator said it would raise that much. I asked him what it would raise.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; it will raise twelve million six hundred and some odd thousand dollars in addition, which is a great deal more than the Senator's amendment would raise.

Mr. HARDWICK. I did the Senator an injustice, then, which I willingly and promptly right. I asked the Senator what it raised, and he said it would raise $12,600,000; I so understood him at least.

Mr. McKELLAR. In addition to the present amount.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator did not say "in addition."

Mr. McKELLAR. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, it is evident that the Senator meant it raised the present figures twelve million six hundred thousand and some odd dollars.

Mr. HARDWICK. Is that what the Post Office Department estimates it will do?

Mr. McKELLAR. They estimate it. I have a letter from Mr. Koons——

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not care anything about that. What is their estimate?

Mr. McKELLAR (continuing). Indorsing the proposition, and giving the amount.

Mr. HARDWICK. I should like to have the Senator put the letter indorsing the proposition in the RECORD.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will put it in the RECORD.

Mr. HARDWICK. Saying that the Post Office Department was for that proposal?

Mr. McKELLAR. Both the Postmaster General and the First Assistant Postmaster General have so expressed themselves to me to-day.

Mr. HARDWICK. I mean the letter.

Mr. McKELLAR. And the First Assistant Postmaster General has so expressed himself in a letter which I will put in the RECORD.

Mr. HARDWICK. Very well. I shall be interested to read the letter.

Now, I do not want to say much more. I am going to conclude in just a moment. I do say this, and I will challenge any Senator on this floor to deny it, I do not care where he comes from, nor how much he knows about this business: I do say that although they continue to put up a poor mouth about this print-paper business, they have already passed most of that on to the public, either to the subscribers—and they have tried that in some notable instances—or to the advertisers, and that has usually proved more effective; that to-day, while they plead for exemption from being required to pay this Government its just dues on the ground that they are hard hit by this print-paper situation, they have already passed that on to the public. I do not hear the statement controverted, so I ask, Mr. President, permission to put in the RECORD certain tables and certain statements showing that. I will make the request general, so that I will not have to refer to it again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Georgia? Without objection, the matter referred to by him will be included in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Increased space devoted to advertising in certain publications.

Publication.	Date.	Normal.	Increase.	Per cent.

Mr. HARDWICK. The following statement was made before the Finance Committee by the First Assistant Postmaster General, Mr. Koons:

If the additional expense is borne jointly by the subscriber and the advertiser it would be even less burdensome, as the necessary increase would not be so great either in the subscription price or in the advertising rates or quantity of advertising.

That it is practicable to increase the subscription rates is shown by the fact that a large percentage of magazines have already increased their subscription rates, and others are preparing to do so, as is shown by the following letter recently sent out by one publication accompanied by a clipping published several months ago in one of the large dailies:

[Woman's Home Companion, The Crowell Publishing Co., 381 Fourth Avenue, New York.]

FINAL NOTICE OF PRICE INCREASE.

DEAR SUBSCRIBER: Right now is your last chance to save from $1 to $3.50 on your renewal subscription to the Woman's Home Companion.

On June 1 the present long-term subscription rates and low rates with other magazines will positively be withdrawn.

Isn't it true—that in spite of the greatly increased cost of paper stock and of everything else involved in magazine manufacture, isn't it true—that you are getting a bigger and better and finer Companion than you ever got before?

And you will continue to get a still bigger and better and finer Companion each month to come. This the editors and publishers guarantee, even though, in order to do so, they must get more for the magazine.

Here are the most important savings, if you renew now, before June 1:

Woman's Home Companion (two-year subscription), until June 1, $2; saves you $1 (yearly price, $1.50).

Woman's Home Companion and the American Magazine (one year each), until June 1, $2; saves you $1.

Woman's Home Companion and the American Magazine and Every Week (one year each), until June 1, $2.25; saves you $1.75.

If you wish other magazines with your Companion, the large amounts you can save by ordering before June 1 are shown on the inclosed price list.

Here is one instance where "rising prices" will not affect you if you act now. Your special acceptance blank is on the back of this letter. Mails are often delayed these days, so take no chances. Mail it to-day.

Cordially, yours,

DAVID BLAIR.

P. S.—No matter when your present subscription to Woman's Home Companion expires, even though it is many months from now, you can take advantage of this "last chance" offer and arrange for your renewal at the present low prices. Your new subscription will begin at the expiration of your present one, and the saving is worth while.

"MAGAZINE FORCED TO INCREASE PRICES—HIT HARD BY IMMENSE RAISE IN COST OF PAPER AND OTHER MATERIALS.

"The magazines as well as the newspapers have been hit hard by the immensely increased cost of white paper and other materials necessary to printing and art work. Announcement was made yesterday that many periodicals have been forced to raise their prices.

"The Metropolitan will jump from $1.50 to $2 a year, Vogue from $4 to $5, Country Life from $4 to $5, McClure's from $1 to $1.50, Cosmopolitan from $1.65 to $2.20, Nautilus from $1.10 to $1.60, Hearst's from $1.65 to $2.20, Photoplay from $1 to $1.20, Journal of Education from $1.75 to $1.85, Outlook from $2.75 to $3.35.

"This is but a partial list of the magazines that have of necessity been compelled to increase their subscription price as well as the single-issue price. Many of them have had at this time to renew their contracts for paper, and so were obliged to meet the extreme expense in the only way possible. Those of the magazines fortunate enough to have longer contracts are safe enough for the time being, but they realize that something will have to be done in the near future.

"Nearly 100 newspapers in the United States have had to raise prices and have notified their readers that the increase will go into effect with the new year. Most of the newspapers of the country are now making their contracts for white paper for the coming year, and have found that they will have to pay nearly 50 per cent more than in the past. Where white paper formerly cost from 2 to 2½ cents a pound it now costs nearly 3½ cents a pound, and the magazines, of course, have been subjected to the same cost strain. Of the 20 smaller magazines in New York several have decided to suspend publication entirely, and others will merge with publications controlled by the same interests."

That it is practicable to increase the quantity of advertising is best illustrated by the fact that it has already been done by the publishers, and I think it would be safe to say that a large amount of the additional expense for print paper, of which so much has already been said, has been met to a large extent in many instances by increasing the quantity of advertising. For instance, one magazine during the year 1916 contained 46 per cent of advertising and is now carrying 53 per cent; another, containing 51 per cent of advertising during the year 1916, is now carrying 64 per cent; another, containing 54 per cent during the year 1916, is now carrying 61 per cent; and another, containing 28 per cent during the year 1916, is now carrying 32 per cent.

Personally, Mr. President, I do not care a picayune about this question. Whatever I have done about it, whatever I have said about it, has been in the performance of a duty that is entirely impersonal and wholly public. It is very much easier to stay on good terms with the publishers of this country, if a Senator is so inclined, to be complacent, to let them continue to receive this unjust bounty that they are getting out of the Treasury of the United States and out of the people of the United States, and not to raise either hand or voice in protest. But, knowing what I do about this question, or what I believe I know, I could never retain my self-respect if I did not.

Some of the newspapers in my own State, Mr. President, are so gracious and so just as to fill up, in large measure or a considerable degree, their columns with personal abuse of me, on the professed reason, at least, of differing with me as to certain positions I have taken as a Member of this body. For them and their opinions I have nothing but the supremest contempt and disdain. Most of them that are not corrupt are worse, and I will meet them, every one, at Philippi. But in my humble opinion the main, if not the controlling, motive for the abuse that they have heaped on me has been the fact that for two or three years I have been waging this fight. The time has come when public men are no longer to be intimidated or bulldozed by these publishers. The time has come, the hour struck, when the people of the United States must know the truth is these arrogant people are common grafters. With an arrogance that shames a democracy, they assume to control men, to make and unmake administrations and cabinets, to exercise all sorts of despotic and arbitrary power, and to mold, by the mere force of iteration, public sentiment and opinion, and especially if anyone undertakes to lay a finger's weight upon their bounty. So long as they are right, so long as their arguments or statements are based on truth, I do not object; but when they begin to echo with parrotlike unanimity exactly the same sentiments about every question that comes up, people begin to wonder whose sentiment they are expressing, and to ask themselves whether they are not, with a few honorable and notable exceptions, all tarred with the same stick, all fed from the same crib, all paid by the same master.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I did not intend to make any more extended remarks about this matter, and yet I think it would be utterly unjust to the Senate, as well as unfair to the Post Office Department, if I did not submit to the Senate the reply of the Postmaster General to the facts and figures and brief of the Southeastern Publishers' Association, upon which is predicated the argument of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], and from which comes the amendment of the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

Before I do so, let me say that it will be impossible for me to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee for the reason that, although it is somewhat better than existing law, when the proposition is boiled down it means no more or less than that the newspapers who are partners in this subsidy propose to leave every one of the other partners in it with the bag to hold and get out themselves. That is what it means. It is no more than that and no less than that, and I can prove it.

Of course, if not only the newspapers but other periodicals are all getting a bounty or subsidy from the Government, it might be said that if we can not take the bounty away from all of them at one time we ought to take it away from as many of them as we can; but, somehow or other, the proposition does not appeal to me as inherently just and fair to leave the newspapers with their subsidy and take it away from everybody else.

I wish my friends who inveigh so eloquently against subsidies could set their lance in rest against all its beneficiaries, against all the bounty takers, whether they happen to be newspapers published in Tennessee or Georgia or magazines published in New York or Boston or somewhere else; but I suppose it is expecting almost too much of human nature to think that at one effort we can go that far.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HARDWICK. Not just for the present.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] offered on this floor, on the 17th day of August, a statement prepared by a number of newspaper men, the statement of the Southeastern Press Association, from which his colleague [Mr. SHIELDS] reads at length to-day, and upon which the argument of his colleague is predicated. On the following morning the Postmaster General of the United States sent me this reply and asked me to invite the attention of the Senator from Tennessee and of the Senate to it. I now read it:

Senator MCKELLAR offered a statement prepared by a number of newspaper men entitled "Newspapers Not Responsible for Annual Deficits in Post Office Department," which was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on pages 6121 and following—

That is the one from which the senior Senator from Tennessee quotes to-day—

In this paper the newspaper men attempted to show that the newspapers are not responsible for any deficiency between the revenue derived from second-class mail matter and the expense for transportation and handling chargeable to second-class mail matter. The difficulty—

And I especially invite the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to this report of the Post Office Department—

The difficulty with the statement in this respect is that its conclusion is based upon certain assumptions, mainly as to conditions of service, which are wholly incorrect. A few of the more important of these will be mentioned, and will be sufficient to destroy the conclusion drawn from the data submitted by them—

That is, by the newspaper men—

The paper assumes that practically no item of cost is chargeable against the newspapers excepting that for transportation on the railroads—

That was the contention, again this morning, of the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS].

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator does not wish to misquote me.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; certainly not. I listened to the Senator very carefully, and I thought that was his contention.

Mr. SHIELDS. My contention was that only 48 per cent was that, and that there was 52 per cent left for payment of overhead charges.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; that 52 cents, or one-half of 1 cent per pound, was the overhead charges. That was the Senator's contention?

Mr. SHIELDS. That 48 cents was for the haul and 52 cents was left to pay the overhead charges.

Mr. HARDWICK. In other words, that the overhead charges of these newspapers in the zones specified by the Senator amount to fifty-two one-hundredths of 1 cent per pound?

Mr. SHIELDS. No; 52 cents per hundred pounds.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, that is fifty-two one-hundredths of a cent a pound, I think. That is what I said.

Mr. SHIELDS. The other is the easier way to put it.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is the same thing. I have the other figures calculated on a pound basis. Now, that statement is not substantially or materially different from the one I have just made, because that amounts to nothing, practically.

Let us see, however. I do not ask the Senator nor the Senate nor the public to take any opinion of mine with respect to any of these matters, because, of course, neither myself nor the Senator from Tennessee has any information of our own that is especially important or in the least valuable to either the Senate or the country on this question. The Senator from Tennessee gets his information from this press association and from the arguments and papers prepared by it.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I think the Senator ought to give my statement fairly.

Mr. HARDWICK. I certainly want to do so.

Mr. SHIELDS. I presented the original papers upon which my conclusions were based, furnished by Mr. Corrigan, from the Post Office Department, to Judge MOON, chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House, and the presumption is that that amounts to something and is authentic.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, the trouble with the Senator's contention and with his figures is that the conclusions drawn from those figures are the conclusions drawn by these newspaper men. I think I am not doing the Senator an injustice. I followed his remarks closely, and he presents exactly the position that Mr. Frank Bell, the president of this association, outlined in writing to me before the Senator from Tennessee enlisted in this cause. The trouble is, he takes the contentions and the conclusions of men who have a pocketbook interest in this matter, and accepts them as the absolute truth about it; and with all respect to my friend from Tennessee, for whom I have the highest opinion, as he knows, and for whom I entertain the warmest regard, that is the mistake which he has made in respect to this entire matter, I believe.

On the other hand, I am following the public officials of this Government, men who have no interest whatever on earth except the public interest in this matter, men who have no bounty to preserve, men who have no privilege to defend. I wish that the distinguished Senators from Tennessee, both of them, could, while they are engaged in this crusade, go the whole way, and while they are engaged in subsidy chasing and bounty destroying go after it all, and not leave a large part of it intact.

Mr. McKELLAR rose.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will yield to the Senator in just a moment.

The paper assumes—

That is, this paper that the Senator read from at such great length—that practically no item of cost is chargeable against the newspapers, excepting that for transportation on the railroads—

You notice the statement of the Postmaster General is "practically no item." The fifty-two one-hundredths of 1 cent a pound is practically none—thus ignoring all cost of other transportation facilities and all cost for handling and overhead charges. With reference to the cost for railroad transportation, the conclusion is based upon an assumption so faulty that it is only necessary to call attention to it in a most general way—

And we all remember, those of us who heard the Senator's statement, how he elaborated on it—

This assumption is that the average weight of mail in a 60-foot car in which the newspapers are carried is 12,000 pounds and for a 30-foot car 6,000 pounds. As a matter of fact—

The department continues—newspapers are not to any great extent carried except in what are known as distributing cars, and the average load in these working or distributing cars has been ascertained by the department to be 5,668 pounds, or 2.83 tons, for the 60-foot car, and 1,474 pounds, or 0.73 of a ton, for a 30-foot car. Although the department has not completed a recent ascertainment of these averages, they are believed to be substantially the same under present conditions—

That means under the experimental trial of the space system instead of the weight system. The department continues:

The average weight of mails carried in the 60-foot storage car was ascertained to be 14,516 pounds, but newspaper mail is not generally carried in such cars. These averages will no doubt be somewhat modified in the new ascertainment, and it is believed that where bulky parcel-post matter is now carried in greater proportion than the heavier fourth-class matter in former years the average weight per car will be rather reduced than increased. A consideration of these figures will show how completely erroneous is the assumption that 12,000 pounds of mail is carried in a working or distributing car, and it must be remembered that it is in this class of cars that newspapers are mainly carried. It follows, of course, that the estimate of cost per pound based upon 12,000 pounds to the car is very much too low—

And those were the estimates that the Senator from Tennessee gave the Senate this morning. The department continues:

The fallacy of the conclusion that $1 per hundred pounds is ample to pay the cost of railroad transportation and leave a surplus for handling charge—

And that was the contention of the Senator from Tennessee—is further shown by a consideration of some general unit cost figures. The department has made an ascertainment of the cost of railroad transportation alone, exclusive of the cost of railway post-office cars, per ton-mile for all mail and equipment carried on the railroads for the year 1916.

This cost is 7.28 cents per ton per mile for all hauls. On this basis the cost of carrying 100 pounds of newspapers the average haul of 255 miles—

By the way, that was found to be an average haul of the newspapers of the country by the Hughes Commission. Two hundred and fifty-five miles is the average haul for newspapers—would be 93 cents.

That is, the cost for carrying it alone will be 93 cents—

The cost for carrying the same 300 miles would be $1.09.

More than the total figure estimated by the two Senators from Tennessee for both transportation and overhead charges and handling and everything else. The department continues:

Although the system of payment has been changed from weight to space on most routes during 1917—

By the way, that change is experimental. It is only pending an investigation of the question and a determination of it by the Interstate Commerce Commission under the terms of existing law; but, to resume the statement—

these unit costs—

He says, although that is true—

will not be materially changed for the purpose of this consideration, as the total cost of railroad transportation under the new system of payment for the year 1917 is only about $1,000,000 less than the total cost for railroad transportation and car service in 1916. Therefore as the revenue in postage derived from 100 pounds of newspapers is only $1, there would be only 7 cents left in the first instance to cover the cost—

That is, for 256 miles—of all other transportation and all handling charges; and in the second instance—

That is, up to 300 miles—

there would be a deficit with nothing to cover such charges. Furthermore, these figures do not cover the cost of the full railway post-office cars, which in 1916 was over $4,000,000.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let me ask the Senator a question, if it will not interrupt him. While that is true about the longest part of the haul, would it not, however, be true that a large part of that mail would go 50 miles and less, and the haul would not be so great, the cost to the Government would not be so great, and that would help equalize it?

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course. It was averaged by the Hughes Commission up to 256 miles, and all that was taken into consideration. If the Senator will examine the Hughes report he will see they arrived at that conclusion as an average for 256 miles, and every one of these considerations, of course, entered into the combination from which the average was obtained.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Hughes commission report was that the average cost for 250 miles was 93 cents per hundred?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes. Now, let us see.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If that was the true figure it can not be correct, because the flat rate——

Mr. HARDWICK. It has not been disputed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I dispute it now, absolutely, on contracts that I saw between the railroads and the Government. The contracts were for a little less than a cent a pound for 200 miles' haul on the railroad. If that was the flat cost to the Government, a little less than a cent a pound for 200 miles, it could not be an average of 93 cents for 250 miles.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is exactly what it is. There is no doubt in the world about it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is not.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, I believe the Senator is mistaken about having ever seen any such proposition. I would be glad to have the Senator produce it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They were Government contracts and they are not here.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator is in error, that is all.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator is in error.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I say I am not.

Mr. HARDWICK. I believe you are. I have not the slightest doubt of it, either.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Neither have I that I am right.

Mr. HARDWICK. You must remember that you are not making the statement from the record, but from your memory.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I had the record then and saw it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Here is the record now.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I say the record at that time showed it.

Mr. HARDWICK. This is the department record. There can be no dispute about it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What I said was that the cost figures four years ago furnished by the department showed second-class mail costing a little less than a cent a pound for 200 miles.

Mr. HARDWICK. I again say I think the Senator must be in error.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator know of his own knowledge who prepared that table?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do, and I will be glad to give the Senator the information. It was prepared by Mr. Stewart, an expert of the department, at the personal request of the Postmaster General, Mr. Burleson, and was by Mr. Stewart brought to me with a statement that the Postmaster General had asked him to bring it to me.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is not signed by anybody.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not think the Senator will impute——

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no.

Mr. HARDWICK. I told the Senator where I got it, and he knows it to be true as I have stated it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not the slightest doubt in the world but that some clerk in the Post Office Department prepared those figures and submitted them.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator is absolutely wrong, as he is about most of these things. He knows nothing whatever about it. The figures came from the very best expert the Government ever had on this question, and they were made at the request of the Postmaster General and were sent to me at the request of the Postmaster General. I do not wonder that the Senator squirms because it destroys his newspaper-made figures. It puts a Senator who is crusading against bounties and subsidies in rather an awkward position.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say, if the Senator will permit an interruption, that the amendment I offer takes some of the bounties away on the Senator's own figures.

Mr. HARDWICK. Not a bit of it. I will answer the Senator on that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let me ask the Senator if the average charge on newspapers is 93 cents for 256 miles, the haul being 256 miles, they must go up to something like a cent and a half.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; for 300 miles it goes to $1.09.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am trying to draw a distinction between the average price and the total price for 200 miles. What is the average rate for 200 miles or 250 miles?

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me read again exactly what the expert says, so that the Senator can draw his own conclusion:

The department has made an ascertainment of the cost of railroad transportation alone, exclusive of the cost of railway post-office cars, per ton per mile for all mail and equipment carried on the railroads for the year 1916. This cost is 7.28 cents per ton per mile for all hauls—

That is, considering the long and short ones and everything else—

On this basis the cost of carrying 100 pounds of newspapers the average haul of 255 miles would be 93 cents.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does not that mean this—that over the United States the average haul for that whole distance of 255 miles is 93 cents?

Mr. HARDWICK. I think so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And not that the newspaper haul of 50 miles costs near so much as those figures. I mean that wherever the second-class matter is hauled 255 miles that length of haul costs the Government 93 cents.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then we agree entirely.

Mr. HARDWICK. All right.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I thought you meant that a newspaper that had business a part going 255 miles distance, a part of it 10 miles, a part of it 50 miles, would pay an average of 93 cents on each pound hauled.

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course my colleague understands it as well as I do. Nothing in the world except the law of averages can be applied to that service.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then is the average to which they refer the average cost for 255 miles or the average cost for less than that distance, going up to that?

Mr. HARDWICK. The cost of carrying 100 pounds of newspapers the average haul of 255 miles would be 93 cents. That is plain enough, it looks to me.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is practically what I thought it was. The average haul when they were on a flat rate was a little less than 1 cent for something over 200 miles.

Mr. HARDWICK. Two hundred and fifty-five miles.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was a little less than a cent a pound for 200 miles when we studied it four years ago.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is not much of a discrepancy.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not much.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is pretty much the same thing. So that corroborates rather than contradicts the statement I present.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have no doubt that is right; and I have no doubt I was right when I said the evidence furnished four years ago was that it cost nearly a cent a pound for 200 miles.

Mr. HARDWICK. That depends on what you mean by nearly—on how much margin is covered by that word.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My recollection is that for about 210 miles it cost a cent a pound, and my cost was greater than even the cost you are presenting now.

Mr. HARDWICK. What I am presenting is the cost figured out by this expert. It may have been reduced.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I knew it had been reduced.

Mr. HARDWICK. It may have been reduced a little. The economy of the department may have reduced it a little, and that may account for whatever discrepancy there is between the figures of the statement and those referred to from memory by my colleague.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I intended to state that I knew it had been reduced below the point it then stood at.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let us see; the statement continues:

Furthermore, these figures do not cover the cost of the full railway post-office cars—

No allowance is made for that—which in 1916 was over $4,000,000, and under the old system was figured in as a part of the handling charge—

And properly so, let me interpolate, of course. These railway mail cars carry these newspapers, and the newspapers ought to pay some part of the expense of the use of the cars—

Neither do they cover the cost of any other means of transportation than the mere haulage on the railroads. The cost of other transportation has been estimated by the department to be—

That is, where they actually rendered it—

6.7 mills per pound—

A very low figure—

As before mentioned, the paper practically ignores the cost of handling and overhead charges, which has been estimated by the department to be 3.86 cents per pound on the average for all second-class mail matter.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHIELDS. That is, one and eighty-six one-hundredths per pound more than was estimated when the Hughes report was made. I see in that report it was estimated that handling and the overhead charges and miscellaneous charges generally made it 2 cents.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Sentor is in error, I think.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have allowed the stenographer to take the report.

Mr. HARDWICK. I have the report before me, and I am glad the Senator has put it in the RECORD, because these figures were taken from the Hughes report.

Mr. SHIELDS. I did read it in the RECORD this morning.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will go back to the Hughes report he will find that the figures I present are accurate. Another Senator made a mistake by questioning this gentleman's accuracy on the floor yesterday, and I think he will hear something later about it. He is one of the most accurate men in the service of the Government.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not want the Senator for a moment to believe that I am conceding his figures.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator may dispute them if he likes.

Mr. SHIELDS. As to the deficit, they are estimating it here one at $72,000,000 and the other at $100,000,000. There does not seem to be anything accurate and certain coming from the Post Office Department about this matter. It has been the greatest trouble I have had in investigating it. I could not get two reports that made the same statement.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is because different men have made different reports, but I doubt if the Senator can show very many different estimates as to the amount of the deficit, coming from the Post Office Department. The estimate of Mr. Stewart, the expert who prepared this statement, was $72,000,000, and the Senator will find on examining the hearings before the Senate Finance Committee he shows how he arrived at that figure.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is Mr. Stewart an employee of the Government?

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly. He was Second Assistant Postmaster General for many years.

Mr. McKELLAR. I know that.

Mr. HARDWICK. He has been in the Postal Service for many years.

Mr. McKELLAR. Sometime ago the Senator will recall that Mr. Stewart was—I do not know how to express it other than to say that he was let out of the service of the Government and another gentleman was put in his place as Second Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. HARDWICK. Then he was made a special assistant. I do not know his precise designation. He is, I think, special assistant of the Postmaster General assigned to the Post Office Department. He is the gentleman who prepares the statements for the Post Office Department with respect to all these matters, and with respect to matters before the Interstate Commerce Commission relating to the mails and the Postal Service; and let me say to the junior Senator from Tennessee that he is the greatest expert, in my opinion, this Government has ever had in regard to matters of this sort.

Mr. McKELLAR. I was informed by Mr. Koons that Mr. Stewart was probably the man who had prepared the amendment which I have introduced and which was first introduced by Judge MOON in the House.

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly he might have done so, at Judge MOON'S request; I have no way of knowing; I never made the inquiry; but, however, this amendment of yours was first introduced by Judge MOON in the House?

Mr. McKELLAR. By Judge MOON in the House.

Mr. HARDWICK. All right.

Mr. McKELLAR. In the Sixty-fourth Congress.

Mr. HARDWICK. This statement proceeds:

As before mentioned, the paper practically ignores the cost of handling and overhead charges, which has been estimated by the department to be 3.86 cents per pound on the average for all second-class mail matter.

Apparently an effort is made to prove that newspapers are not chargeable with any handling cost, but the mistake of this must be evident to anyone familiar with the mail service. As a matter of fact, newspapers which go into the mails are given preferred treatment in post offices and in the postal cars They are hauled substantially with as much expedition as first-class mail matter. The paper describes the receipt and delivery of certain newspaper matter as typical of all, but it is apparent that a description has been given of the handling of what is generally known as outside mail, or outside packages, which are made up and handed to the railroad employees and merely put off the train when reaching the station of destination. This constitutes a very small part of newspaper mail matter. Furthermore, it may be that the writers of this paper have confused with the mail service the practice of newspaper publishers of handling their mail matter on trains wholly outside of the mail service. It must be understood that all such newspaper matter can not be considered at all, as it does not enter the mail service. The Government receives no postage from it and therefore it is not chargeable with any cost and is never considered by the department in making estimates of costs.

The writers of the paper also argue that newspapers are not chargeable with the cost of rural free delivery, because, as they claim, if the newspapers were not sent on rural routes, the department could not discontinue any service or diminish the expense. This argument ignores the fundamental principle of cost keeping, viz, that all functions should be charged with their proportionate share of expenses in which they participate—

And, I will add, from which they benefit—

On the theory of the writers of the paper, all the magazines could likewise make similar claim that they should not be charged with any expense. Indeed, all the other classes of mail would be entitled to the same exemptions.

The writers of the paper make other erroneous statements in comparing newspapers with magazines, one of which is that the newspapers at no time require or demand extra cars or extra service. The facts are that extra mail trains are established out of the large cities almost entirely for the benefit of newspapers. The ordinary mails would not call for trains at such hours and, were it not for the newspapers, probably could be dispensed with.

There are many minor errors of statement and conclusion in the paper but, as they mostly appear to be secondary to the main assumptions which have been analyzed and refuted, it would seem unnecessary to mention them.

Mr. President, so the issue is, when it is understood, when stripped before this body and the country, the only merit of the proposal of the Senator from Tennessee is that he, inveighing against bounty, against special privilege, against bounty grabbers and Treasury looters, wants to stop some of them—not all of them. Of course, so far as he stops any of them, it is better than what is happening under existing law, but for one I am opposed to any halfway measures about this thing. If this business is wrong, as the Senator from Tennessee contends, it is just as wrong when the newspapers benefit as it is when the magazines benefit. We ought not to draw any line between them or make any discrimination between them that is not based on the facts or on what the service costs.

In that respect I submit to both Senators from Tennessee that instead of taking the figures and the conclusions drawn from figures by these publishers, who have a selfish pecuniary interest in it, it would be much safer and much wiser and much better for us to take the estimates of the Government officials, who are impartial about this matter and have no selfish motives of any kind involved in it.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. I know the Senator will remember that in my discussion of this matter I asked no favors for the daily newspapers, but my contention was that they paid full value for the service rendered, if not a little more, and the Senator's statement that I would give to the newspapers the bounties they receive is wholly beside the question, because I did not ask that they be granted any bounties.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] does, Senator.

Mr. SHIELDS. That is a different thing. If I am wrong in my estimate——

Mr. HARDWICK. The department says you are——

Mr. SHIELDS. And they do not pay for the service rendered and they are getting some bounty; while I am not interested in any newspaper nor close to any man in the way of relationship who is, I feel authorized to say on this floor for the newspapers of our country—in Georgia, in Tennessee, throughout the great Mississippi Valley and the West, all, I might say, of that class outside of the metropolitan papers—if the Post Office Department will make a careful calculation and estimate a correct cost of transportation of papers they would be glad to pay it.

Mr. HARDWICK. And be willing to pay it.

Mr. SHIELDS. They are not asking any bounty. They believe they are paying full value, and they are willing to pay it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am very glad to hear the Senator say that. Does the Senator say that by authority of the newspapers?

Mr. SHIELDS. No.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is merely your opinion?

Mr. SHIELDS. That is my opinion.

Mr. HARDWICK. Then, eventually the Senator will learn that justice to the Treasury and to the people of the United States will require that these rates be raised as to newspapers as well as to magazines, and my friend from Tennessee will adopt that course, but when he does I predict he will have to part company with his newspaper friends, who will be found, then as now, standing by their pocketbooks.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will yield, that has been exactly the course that has been pursued and contended before here by this Senator from Tennessee from the very beginning.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am perfectly willing to credit the junior Senator from Tennessee, for whom I always have high regard, with the same honorable intention. I never for a moment thought otherwise; yet I do say that both Senators from Tennessee and every other Senator who supports this proposition is wrong. I think I might have voted for it myself if you had not put in it an amendment that exempts from its terms several classes of publications; a proposition I can never support in any kind of legislation But let no Senator deceive himself; when he votes for this proposal he will, in effect, have continued to give a subsidy of a good many million dollars a year to the newspapers of the country.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would it interrupt the Senator if I ask him a question?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly not.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Was I right in understanding the Senator to say that the department reported to you that the overhead cost, the handling cost, was just 7 mills per pound?

Mr. HARDWICK. No; you are not right.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I took it down.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will let the Senator have access to these figures. The particular figure my colleague now has in his mind relates to an entirely different matter.

Now, Mr. President, many Senators for whom I entertain feelings of both respect and friendship have, I believe, been imposed upon in this matter, and I appeal to both Senators from Tennessee and every other Senator who is even thinking of supporting this amendment not to do it blindly or ignorantly. You had far better accept the statements and figures of the public officials of the country, who have no selfish interest in this matter, than to follow the contentions and accept the figures of the newspapers about it. It will not be long before both Senators from Tennessee will have to vote to increase these newspaper rates unless they are willing to perpetuate a subsidy, and to do so knowingly, and that they could not and would not do, I know. I am not sure, under all circumstances, but what it would not be better to cut the whole thing out of this bill, because Senators who have not been able to give it careful study and who do not know the truth about it are honestly and ignorantly making the grossest mistakes about it. I would rather see the question remitted for careful examination to the standing committees that have jurisdiction of it than to see the Senate make mistakes, and, because it is not informed, either do the wrong thing or fail to do the right thing about this matter.

When these rates are revised the revision should be thorough and complete and its application universal and impartial. We should have no favorites to exempt from the just provisions of a just law, and hesitate long before we make fish of the newspapers and fowl of the magazines.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, although the Senate Chamber is almost empty, I desire before I vote to very briefly explain why I will not vote for the committee recommendations. I can not do so because I do not think they are equitable, and I do not think they justly place the burden. The proposed tax is caused by the desire of the committee to remove some of the loss to the Government in connection with second-class mail. My criticism is that the committee amendments do not confine the increased postal charges to those publications which cause the loss.

I was on the Post Office Committee for more than two years, and we made a very thorough study while I was there of second-class mail transportation. I reached the conclusion that the Government lost very heavily by carrying it at existing rates, but not as much as the Post Office Department claimed.

The cost of transportation consists of two things—handling and haul. There is an expense to the Government of handling the mail, and there is an expense to the Government paid to the railroads for hauling the mail. It is perfectly easy to find out the cost of the haul. That is covered by contracts with the railroads. When we came to the cost of handling, there was no separate system of bookkeeping kept by the department as to what the cost of handling second-class mail was or what the cost was for other kinds of mail. There was an estimate, and I regarded the estimate of the handling cost by the department then as excessive. I did not believe that they could sustain their claim of all the handling cost that they put upon second-class mail, but I do believe the loss to the Government reached something like $50,000,000 annually.

Now, the great cost of the second-class mail is the haul. It differs from first-class mail on account of its weight. At that time the Government was paying the railroads approximately a cent a pound for every haul of 210 miles. That was about the sum that the Government paid the railroads. Therefore, when we hauled second-class mail over 210 miles the additional cost of the haul came right out of the Treasury, for we only charged a cent a pound for the haul and the handling both. We lost what it cost us to handle it and we lost all the additional cost of the haul.

Now, according to the report from the department just read by my colleague [Mr. HARDWICK], the cost of the haul under the new system is about a cent a pound for 275 miles instead of 210 miles. The Government gets a little longer haul for a cent a pound, and his figures now give the cost of the haul at a cent a pound for 275 miles. This being true, any second-class matter hauled that distance is no charge, so far as the haul is concerned, to the Government; the Government only loses the handling cost; but when the Post Office Department carries second-class mail matter 3,000 miles there is a loss to the Government from the haul of about 10 cents a pound. If the distance of the haul is less than 275 miles the second-class mail matter pays for the cost of the haul; but when it reaches on beyond that, for each 275 miles it produces a loss of a cent a pound to the Government.

My objection to the report of the committee is that it does not regard in its increased charges the actual cost of the particular second-class mail matter to the Government. If the second-class mail matter, the newspaper or the magazine, is hauled 50 miles the cost of the haul to the Government is not more than one-quarter of a cent a pound; if it is hauled 150 miles it is a little more than half a cent a pound. It only reaches the cent a pound at 275 miles. The great loss to the Government is the second-class mail matter that is hauled a long distance—hauls that stretch to 500, 750, 1,000, 2,000, and 3,000 miles. There is where the loss comes. When the Government hauls the publications of the Curtis Publishing Co. from Philadelphia to San Francisco the Government loses something like 10 cents a pound on every pound of their publications hauled to San Francisco, and that is paid out of the Treasury and not out of the funds of the publishing company; but if the haul is less than 275 miles the Government loses nothing by the haul.

My colleague [Mr. HARDWICK] attacks the newspapers for objecting to anything but a zone system and for objecting to an increase of charge on the haul of less than 275 miles. My reply is that the cost of the haul for 275 miles is paid by a cent a pound which is charged on second-class mail matter. My reply furthermore is that the handling cost to the Government of newspapers is very much less than the handling charge per pound upon nearly all other second-class mail matter, for the reason that the newspapers make up their pouches with their own paid employees and paid route agents in their own offices; they do not send any considerable part of their newspapers to the home post office to be made up there, the charge for handling to be paid for by the Government.

They have them made up in their own offices; they hire their own men to do it; and no charge at the home office for handling falls upon the Government to any considerable extent where newspapers are concerned. Even at the office of destination the handling charge is scarcely anything in the case of newspapers, for a large part of their circulation goes in bulk to single dealers or to carriers and is not distributed as mail matter usually is—in single packages through the post office. So I deny that the handling of second-class newspaper mail matter causes the Government the loss of anything approximating the loss on the great magazines.

The average distance that the newspaper goes is not over 250 miles, while the average distance which the magazine goes is nearly 700 miles. The chief cost of the second-class mail matter to the Government is the haul. Second-class mail matter is heavy; it weighs a great deal. It is not like the ordinary letter. The letter weighs an ounce or less. The cost of the letter is the handling; it is so light that the payment to the railroads for hauling is trivial, and the distance has but little to do with the cost to the Government; but when it comes to second-class mail matter, where you undertake to haul a pound for a cent, distance and the cost to the Government in paying the railroad companies for the haul is the great feature of expense to the Government, and this causes the loss in the service.

Mr. President, I believe that there should be an increased charge for second-class mail matter, based upon the cost to the Government of hauling it—not the complete cost, but some more of it. That cost can only fairly be estimated when you put it upon the distance of the haul. It is the distance of the haul of the heavy matter that depletes the Treasury. If you intend that publications shall pay what the service costs the Government you must fix your charges by a zone system, according to the length that you haul the matter, because what you have to pay out of the Treasury is due to the length that you have to haul the second-class mail matter. I do not believe we should undertake to charge at once all that it costs the Government; I do not know that we should ever do so; but I do believe that the Government is contributing too much.

Let us consider the suggestion of the committee. It undertakes to meet the situation by adding one-fourth of a cent per pound at once to all second-class mail matter. That is not fair. The second-class mail matter that does not go over 250 miles has not cost the amount charged for the haul; that which has gone 3,000 miles has cost 10 cents a pound. Now, you propose to add one-fourth of a cent to all, when that which went a little over 200 miles did not cause the Government to lose anything and that which went 3,000 miles caused a loss of 10 cents a pound. It is not fair; it is not meeting the situation. You are trying to make the short-haul man, who has cost you nothing, pay for your loss on the long haul. I object to that and shall not vote for that. It comes from the committee, but it is not fair and I will not vote for it.

Then, furthermore, what does the committee propose to do? It proposes to charge all publishers 5 per cent on their net profits to help make up for this loss on the second-class postage. That is not fair.

Mr. McKELLAR. On the long haul of it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Well, I say the loss on the second-class postage. Let us think about that a moment. Here are two newspapers published in the same city—a morning paper and an afternoon paper. The morning paper may clear $10,000 a year and the afternoon paper may clear $50,000 a year. I am taking a small city. The afternoon paper circulates by carriers in the city and has practically no mailing list. It may supply some surrounding cities, but if so, it ships its papers out by express in bundles for delivery to its own carriers. Its cost to the Government for transportation is scarcely anything. It makes $50,000 a year. The morning paper makes $10,000 a year. The bulk of its issue goes out in the mail; it costs the Government a large sum for transportation; and yet the 5 per cent tax would take $2,500 out of the revenue of the afternoon paper which puts no charge on your Postal System, while it would take but $500 out of the revenues of the morning paper, which puts a heavy charge on your Postal System.

I am in favor of equitably increasing the second-class mail-matter rates, but I am not in favor of increasing them anywhere or on anybody beyond what it is costing the Government to perform the service for the particular company. I will not vote for any kind of an increase that saddles A with the losses the Government has suffered from handling the business of B. If you can not work out a system without loading your losses from A onto B, then stand the losses. That is fair.

I will vote against the entire proposition, both the one-fourth cent increase and the 5 per cent tax, and leave them all with no increase before I will agree to load one company down with the losses caused by a different company. It is not right; it is not defensible; it is inexcusable; it will not pass.

Senators have said that there was an effort to shield the newspapers. I utterly deny it. There is an effort to charge no company for any business more than its business is costing the Government. If we can not get a return of some of the excess cost which is put on the Government fairly, we should not take anything at all. I prefer to leave it as it is rather than to load one man down, on whom you are losing nothing, with what you lost on somebody else. The majority of the daily newspapers in the smaller cities of from 25,000 to 50,000 inhabitants do not go outside of a zone of 200 miles. In that case 1 cent pays the Government all the cost. The magazine or the daily newspaper, whichever it may be, that goes out 550 miles, causes the Government a loss of a cent a pound, and so on, as each 275 miles is added.

The original theory upon which this system was adopted was intended to help distribute information literature. I believe that is wise. I am not in favor of undertaking to make rates that dig to the bottom; I am not in favor of rates which would make it impossible to move magazines from one part of the country to the other. I think, in the interest of the general public, we had better suffer some loss than to stop such a distribution of literature. It is this immense advertising business, the utilization of the second-class mails for money-making, in addition to the distribution of literature, that has largely brought on the excess of loss and the shock to the public conscience.

I prefer an equitable zone system based upon increased charges for advertising matter, and leaving the reading matter to go as at present, at 1 cent a pound, everywhere. I do not advocate that system for the purpose of giving a subsidy to the publishers, but because I believe that the distribution of literature is beneficial to the entire public. However, I hardly think the Senate is ready for the consideration of such a measure. The amendment of the Senator from Tennessee will raise $12,000,000 more of revenue; it is harsh to nobody; nobody under it pays as much as the service rendered him costs the Government; but it equitably distributes the increase by placing the greatest burden upon those who are imposing the large charge upon the Government in excess of what they are paying for the service.

I grant that the Government will not collect all the cost of the service; I do not think it should collect it all. I think we would break up valuable publications if we took that rather extreme view; but in the interest of no particular class of publications, in the interest of the Treasury, I believe that some of these excess charges should be borne by a zone system—one, however, which does not undertake to begin to increase the charge until the distance from the place where the publication is issued is such that the cost of transportation to the Government is more than 1 cent a pound. I think that would be an equitable plan on which to base a zone charge.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEW in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator from Georgia now speaking has entered into a very interesting field as to the amount of money that in his judgment would be produced under the operation of the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee. That to me is a most important phase of the question, and I think the Senator from Georgia will discover it is very important to many of us who do not know the newspaper business as a business. May I take the liberty to ask the Senator if he would object to including in his remarks such observations as his knowledge of newspaper publication and circulation may warrant, showing that his statement is not a guess merely as a legislator, but is borne out by some personal experience he has had with newspapers and the methods by which they are conducted, so as to give to the figures which he presents a base of accuracy?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The amendment was submitted to the Post Office Department, and the Post Office Department estimated that it would produce an increase of over $12,000,000. That was worked out by the post-office experts.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, to be accurate, the estimated increase would be $12,616,470. That estimate was submitted to Mr. Koons, the First Assistant Postmaster General, and I have a letter from him in my pocket which indorses those figures, which I will put in the RECORD; but I have given the Senator from Illinois the exact figures. I ask that the letter to which I have referred be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, is it so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

JUNE 25, 1917.

MY DEAR SENATOR: On the basis of the second-class matter handled during the last fiscal year, it is estimated that the revenue under the amendment proposed by you would be approximately $24,000,000, which is an increase of $12,616,470 over last year, as the revenue derived from postage on second-class matter for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, amounted to $11,383,530.

J. C. KOONS.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
August 8, 1917.

Memorandum:

The attached amendment of Senator McKELLAR would make an increase of approximately $10,000,000 in the revenues, or a total revenue of about $21,000,000.

J. C. K.

Mr. LEWIS. I happen to know, of course, that the Senator from Georgia has been himself a publisher of a very large and influential paper in the State of Georgia, and that he is not without knowledge as to the practical operation of newspapers as well as of matters of statesmanship. I now beg to ask—and I hope the Senator will pardon me for the interruption—what did the Senator from Georgia say a while ago was his estimate of the amount of revenue which would be raised by the suggested amendment of his colleague, the junior Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That would raise a little over $20,000,000, as I understand. That again has been estimated by the Post Office Department, and my recollection is that the report upon that amendment estimates an increase of something over $20,000,000.

I wish to say again, very frankly, that I would rather see passed the amendment suggested by the junior Senator from Georgia; I would rather have the increased rates based upon advertising and to have reading matter left with the permanent bounty from the Government occasioned by charging for long-haul transportation less than the service costs the Government; but I hardly think the Senate has studied that new suggestion sufficiently to accept it, and I think that the chances to do something are with the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee. I shall therefore vote for that amendment, especially as it comes up first. It will raise less revenue, but in the judgment of some it is more equitable, in that it regards the amount of the loss caused the Government for the transportation and makes no discrimination between advertisements and reading matter. At any rate, it is not burdensome; at any rate, it does not stop transportation; at any rate, it adds no charge to anyone in excess of what the Government is giving him; no one is called on by it to pay more than it is costing the Government to give him the service.

My objection to the committee amendment is that in seeking to get back some of the loss to the Government they are putting the increased charge where there is no loss rather than where the extreme loss occurs. They propose to put one-fourth of a cent more on everybody who sends second-class mail matter, while the report of the Post Office Department shows that a cent a pound pays for a haul of 275 miles. A great many of the morning papers do not have any second-class mail that goes beyond 275 miles, and the bulk of it is confined to a territory within 50 miles from the office of publication. Therefore, the distance of the haul being only 50 miles, the cost to the Government of the haul is less than one-fourth of a cent per pound, and the Government has three-fourths of a cent a pound left to cover the cost of handling.

As to the daily paper the circulation of which does not reach over 100 miles, a cent a pound pays the Government for the haul and for the handling. I protest against putting one-fourth of a cent a pound on that paper, when the Government is losing nothing on that paper, to make up losses on the big magazines or on some other publications. It is not fair. I do not think the committee would have done it if they had studied the subject thoroughly or had served upon the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and had greater familiarity with the subject.

I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee. I would be willing to eliminate before we vote on it the last zone charge provided. I should rather like to see the last zone, which adds the last increase in charge, taken off. I do not want to see the charge made so high that publications will not be able to move across the continent, but I think some part of the loss ought to be borne by them and that they ought to be made to pay for the long haul something more than they pay now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee as amended to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, on yesterday I asked to strike out the words "July 31, 1917," in the amendment and insert the words "October 31." I now desire to modify the amendment by striking out "October 31, 1917," and substituting therefor "January 1, 1918." Those words occur in the first line of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator proposes a modification of his amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. I merely wish to perfect my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a right to do that, and, unless there is objection, the modification will be made.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I presume the Senator has a motive in changing the date when this amendment is to go into effect?

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to give the Post Office Department time to prepare for the change.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator wants to give time, I think he might appropriately make it 10 years instead of 1.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unless there is objection, the modification suggested by the Senator from Tennessee will be made. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. McKELLAR. Again, Mr. President, in line 9 of the amendment, on the second page, I wish to add the letter "s" to the word "publisher," so as to make it read "publishers."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unless there is objection, the modification will be made. It is so ordered.

Mr. McKELLAR. Again, Mr. President, in the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota to my amendment, adding a second proviso, the word "further" was left out, and, in order to perfect it, I ask that the word "further" be substituted in the second proviso.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unless there is objection, it will be so ordered. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I have received a letter which refers to a statement made by me in some remarks I submitted to the Senate yesterday, which I should like to have read, so that it may go into the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, August 29, 1917.

Hon. JOHN W. WEEKS,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR WEEKS: I notice in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday, page 7003, that you say that the Hughes Commission stated in 1911 that it cost the Government 5½ cents a pound to carry second-class matter, and you argue from this that the estimates of loss of substantially $80,000,000 is a ridiculously high figure.

I infer that when you speak of 5½ cents you mean the entire cost of transporting and handling as ascertained and apportioned by the department. Of course, I know that you do not wish to make a statement which is incorrect, and I therefore am confident that you overlooked the fact that the 5½ cents mentioned by the Hughes Commission did not include any portion whatever of the cost of the Post Office Service, and certain unassigned expenses which they specify. These items, no part of which they included, amounted to $89,442,000 at that time, and a fair portion of them should, of course, be added to the amount from which they found the 5½ cents. The commission further found that the department had estimated the cost of handling in the post offices and the fair portion of these miscellaneous expenses assignable to second-class matter as slightly more than 2 cents a pound. This added to the 5½ cents found by the commission would have made a total of 7½ cents a pound.

You will find, on pages 639–641, inclusive, of "Hearings and briefs before the Committee on Finance, United States Senate, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, on H. R. 4280, part 2," my statement giving conservative estimate of the cost of transporting and handling second-class matter at the present time, which on the average is not less than 7 cents a pound. Your universal disposition of fairness to the department prompts me to furnish you with this information in order that no injustice may result from your statements, which always carry great weight.

Sincerely, yours,

JOSEPH STEWART,
Special Assistant to the Attorney General.

Mr. WEEKS. I have submitted that letter to the RECORD because it comes from Mr. Stewart, who, of all men connected with the Post Office Department, probably knows more about the details of the work there than any other official. He is correct in saying that the Hughes Commission did not include the salaries of postmasters, assistant postmasters, and some other items of expense in estimating the cost of second-class mail matter at 5½ cents a pound. Of course, that does not in any degree modify what I said yesterday about the premises adopted by the Hughes Commission in making up those figures; and I do not care now to take time to discuss this particular question, which has no special bearing on the matter before the Senate. There are other comments which I might make relative to the report of the Hughes Commission which would greatly modify, in my judgment, the statement that the cost of carrying second-class mail was 5½ or 6½ of 7½ cents a pound.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] as amended.

Mr. McKELLAR. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Harding	McKellar	Sherman
Borah	Hardwick	McNary	Shields
Brady	Hollis	Martin	Simmons
Brandegee	Husting	Nelson	Smith, Ga.
Broussard	James	New	Smith, Mich.
Calder	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Smoot
Colt	Jones, N. Mex.	Owen	Sterling
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Page	Sutherland
Curtis	Kendrick	Penrose	Swanson
Fernald	Kenyon	Phelan	Townsend
Fletcher	King	Pittman	Trammell
France	Kirby	Poindexter	Underwood
Frelinghuysen	Knox	Pomerene	Vardaman
Gerry	La Follette	Ransdell	Wadsworth
Gore	Lewis	Robinson	Weeks
Gronna	Lodge	Shafroth	Williams
Hale	McCumber	Sheppard	Wolcott

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee as amended, upon which the yeas and nays have been demanded. Is the request seconded?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think the debate on this question is concluded; but I feel that in justice to the committee and to some Senators who have not been able to listen to the debate I should make a short statement of the situation as it is now presented to the Senate. I am not going to discuss the merits of these propositions.

For more than two days now we have listened to arguments for and against different amendments which have been submitted to this bill. Those of us who have been permitted to hear those arguments realize the great importance of the questions involved, and what I wish to impress upon the Senate now is that it was the very importance of the very amendments now before us which caused the committee to take the action which it did.

We considered the question of establishing a zone system. That was in the bill as it came from the House. We considered the question of modification of the zone system as now appearing in the McKellar amendment, and of modification in another way as it appears in the Hardwick amendment; but the more we considered the more did we realize the difficulties in the way of trying to settle the problem. We realized that, in one sense, second-class matter was not paying its way, but there were strong arguments presented to the effect that the increase in first-class matter brought about through the dissemination of advertisements and second-class matter doubtless compensated in great measure for what is an apparent loss on second-class matter.

These things were all presented to the committee. The advisability of establishing a zone system at all was considered. The argument was presented that in this country of ours there should be no such thing as a zone system; that even advertisements are just as educational as some of the reading matter which goes out and would go out under all these amendments with no increased postage. These things were all presented to us. We realized the difficulties in the way, and therefore, Mr. President, instead of trying to revise the postal system of the country we considered the matter from another point of view entirely.

The question as to what the postal rates should be is one which, I submit, should be considered by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. The Finance Committee was excoriated to a considerable extent because it had dealt with this question at all. I want to say that the Finance Committee has dealt with it just as tenderly as it possibly could in view of the bill presented to it from the House.

This bill provides that the revenues to be derived under the bill from postal rates shall be turned over to the General Treasury; that they are not to be kept in the post-office funds, as other receipts from postal rates are kept. That shows that the purpose of this bill is to increase revenue for the general purposes of the Government during this time of war. So the committee, when it came to consider this question, treated it precisely as it has attempted to treat every other question, to try to raise revenue in a way that would cause the least possible injury to the business of this country.

Every system which is proposed here by way of amendment, the one amendment or the other, if put into effect, would absolutely destroy some of the big business interests of the country, and this is no time for destruction at home. We have enough destruction to do abroad. We want to keep up the business interests of the country. If the McKellar amendment is adopted, which establishes a zone system in a modified form, there is not any doubt but that it is going to bankrupt a number of the publishing concerns of the country, and the same thing may be said of the Hardwick amendment. So the committee decided that it did not want to bankrupt anybody, but it did want to raise revenue if it could do it without injury to anybody. For that reason, observing and realizing the complexity of the problem as presented in these amendments, the Finance Committee chose not to go into it and try to reform the postal laws of the country.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, is it not true, though, that you put on these increased rates upon the ground that there was a loss in second-class postage; and is it not further true that you put them where there was not a loss, and did not put them fully where there was a loss?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the suggestion of the Senator carries much of merit with it; but we did realize that second-class postal matter was being carried at an apparent loss, and that there seemed to be more sentiment for trying to do something with the second-class rates to bring them up on some kind of an equality, or to make them bear some part of the cost of carriage. But we realized that to do that would involve the very integrity of these enterprises; and we ascertained, so far as we were able to do, that the imposition of an increase of a quarter of a cent a pound upon second-class matter would not materially injure or bankrupt any business in the country.

The suggestion just made by the Senator from Georgia involves the question of a zone system. The Senator's proposition means nothing more than that you should favor concerns sending their mail only one or two or three hundred miles from the place of deposit in the post office. That establishes the principle of the zone system; and it is my belief that if there is any one thing which ought not to be done it is the establishment of a zone system in this country.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if those going only 200 miles do not cost the Government a cent a pound, why should you load them down with a charge because something else, going very much farther, costs more than a cent a pound?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, if the suggestion of the Senator were carried out, I think it would be the worst possible thing for the very enterprises which he seeks to shield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, that is scarcely fair. I do not seek to shield them, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Well, I withdraw that word.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask that they may not be charged more than they are an expense to the Government. That is all I ask.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will say "protect," then.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It costs the Government just as much to carry mail matter in one zone as it does in seven.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, the Senator is utterly mistaken about that. The rate per pound hauled, as shown to-day, is a cent for each 275 miles; and if the haul is 3,000 miles the payment to the railroads for transportation per pound relates to the haul for 275 miles as 3,000 relates to 275.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; and the Government loses upon both operations, so it makes nothing on either.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The argument has been made that we should not increase the rates within the first, second, and third zones for the reason suggested by the Senator from Georgia; but in any ambitious center in this country the very newspapers and periodicals published there, which to-day would get special benefits from the suggestion of the Senator, in my opinion would be ultimately injuring their business if they are ambitious to become means of communication to the country at large. It would tend to localize the information of this country; and if there is any one thing we do not want to do it is to localize the information of the country. We want the information to go out all over the country, and, so far as I am concerned, I want the advertisements to go out all over the country. According to my notion, they are a great medium of information. They weld the people of the country together. The people are permitted in every section of the country to know of the new devices, and, among the ladies, to keep up with the styles and the fashions of the country throughout the whole Nation.

But these, Mr. President, were the difficulties which the Finance Committee encountered, and it did not undertake to solve all these problems. There are objections to every one of them. They are serious and strong; and so the committee undertook to do something which would raise revenue but would not injure the business interests of the country. So it has proposed to put a quarter of a cent a pound increase on the carriage of second-class matter. It has proposed, as will come up in the bill further on, a tax of 5 per cent on the net income of these publishers, with a $4,000 exemption. That provision will be debated when we get to it. I have received a telegram from my own State to-day asking me to vote against this 5 per cent tax. They evidently did not realize there was a $4,000 exemption, and I do not believe there are over one or two papers in my State that will pay anything under the 5 per cent income-tax provision in this bill. At any rate, they will not be hurt. They have had the benefit of the mail. They can afford to do it. It is not logical. I agree with the statements here that it is not logical; but this is a time of war, when we are trying to make provision to carry on this Government; when we are trying to get revenue where it will not injure anybody; and inasmuch as these second-class matters are being carried at a loss, apparently everybody agreeable to the proposition, it seems to me that we might go into that line of industry and obtain at least some revenue.

I therefore ask the Senate to vote down the McKellar amendment, to vote down the Hardwick amendment, and then let us take up the consideration of the amendments offered by the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, there are some few things of which Senators and Representatives are afraid. Among these things are the newspapers and the magazines of the country. It is not at all strange that Senators and Representatives should be scared by either one of them, because they have an immense influence, intellectually and morally, and they do impress themselves upon the mind of the average citizen to an extent that one solitary voice, whether it be the voice of a Senator or a Representative, can not counteract.

I want to appeal to the Senate, in the first place, to discuss this question without any cowardice, to discuss it without any fear, and to discuss it solely from the standpoint of trying to do justice by these people.

Mr. President, there is nothing harder in the world than for a class of men to agree voluntarily to discontinue, even partially, a subsidy or a bounty, which they have been receiving from the general public. Of course it is very difficult for the newspapers and for the magazines to make up their minds to discontinue even partially the bounty that we have been giving them. That bounty runs all the way from thirty millions to sixty millions per annum—depending upon the man who is calculating its amount. We have attempted to get back from them in the shape of taxes fifteen millions of it—one-half of it, if it is thirty millions, and one-fourth of it, if it is sixty millions. That is all we are trying to do.

You take a man out of the ordinary sphere and surfeit him and feed him at the public expense a long while and of course it is very difficult for him to conceive that it is just to deprive him of his daily bread, although his daily bread has been given to him as a free gift by the public. That is exactly and literally the case with these people.

Mr. President, somebody in this debate said that this Finance Committee provision might or would be all right, but this was not the time to do it. It is preeminently the time to do it. It is preeminently the time when the Federal Government should try to economize by withdrawing subsidies and bounties to anybody, for any service whatsoever. Now, in ordinary peace times I believe in giving a bounty to the dissemination of information. I do not care whether the Government loses thirty or sixty millions of dollars; I have been willing to lose it, because all democratic institutions are founded upon the assumption of information among the people, so that I have been willing always to let the second-class mail rate stay where it was. I have thought that if any bounty by the general public to any particular interest at all was justified a bounty in favor of the spread of information and the dissemination of intelligence was justified. But these are not ordinary times. We are making every citizen of the United States pay something out of his pocket. Why not, then, make these people abstain partially from drawing something out of the common Treasury?

I heard the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], I believe, say the other day that we were levying "a special and a discriminatory tax" upon these people. I believe it was he who said it. We are doing nothing of the sort. We are merely discontinuing a part of the bounty that we are and have been paying them, a part of the subsidy that they are receiving and have received for years—receiving upon the theory that I have just stated, that it was worth the money that it cost the Government to inform the people. It is absolutely an unfounded statement that we are trying to do anything with these people except to get back a little bit of the money that we have been giving them annually—giving them, or, if you choose to express it so, paying to them, upon the theory that they were rendering a public service—it does not make any difference which—only one-half of their hitherto gratuity, even by their calculation.

Mr. President, I am in favor of the settlement which the Finance Committee of the Senate has reached upon this question. Now, what is it? It is a raise of one-fourth of 1 cent per pound on second-class mail matter. That is a part of it. Does anybody want to tell me that a raise of one-fourth of a cent a pound upon second-class mail matter can bankrupt anything that is not already virtually bankrupt? You know better and I know better.

Ah, Mr. President, I remember so well when the publishers came before the Finance Committee of the Senate aflame with patriotism and with enthusiasm. The House had sent us over a proposition for a zone system, and they said: "Of course we want to pay our share, and we want to pay more than our share, but we can not stand that. That will murder us in our tracks." The Senate Finance Committee shortly after that time had fixed a tax upon gross receipts, as the Senator from New Mexico will remember, and they said: "We want to pay every dollar, and more than every dollar, assessable against us, if necessary. We are the great 'patriotism-arousing agency' of the United States; but do not tax us on our gross receipts, because a tax upon our gross receipts might deprive us of all of our profit and send us into a loss." Whereupon the Finance Committee said, "Well, you are right about that," and then a man or two arose, and I remember one of them addressed the committee in eloquent terms. He said, in substance: "Take from us all of our net receipts. We are patriotic to the core. We are pro-American and anti-German, and we want this fight fought to a finish until the world can have peace. Take all of our net receipts, but do not touch anything beyond our profits"; and there was a general ripple of applause all around among the 50 or 60 or 100 representatives of the press and the publishing houses around that committee room. It impressed me, and I am not a very impressionable creature. It impressed the committee, and we said: "Here are men wanting to give all their net profits to the Government to fight this war. They are too patriotic; they are too unselfish. We will not do that. We will just take 5 per cent—one-twentieth—of their net profits, one-half, in the aggregate, of the bounty and the gift that they are now enjoying annually at the hands of the United States, even according to the lowest calculation that has ever been made," which was $30,000,000.

As to this fool enterprise of putting newspapers in the zone system and subjecting the dissemination of information and intelligence, like "base merchandise," to a zone system, that is too absurd to talk about. You may call it merchandise, and so in a sense it is, and so in a sense Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice was, and Sir Walter Scott's Waverly or Ivanhoe; but in no proper sense is the dissemination of information by newspapers and periodicals and magazines merely merchandise, and it ought not to be judged upon the merchandise standard.

Mr. President, we are, after some ineffectual efforts of my ancestors to the contrary, a Nation. The great trouble with America to-day is that it is not sufficiently a Nation yet. There is a German group, a Bohemian group, a Hungarian group, an Austrian group, a workingman's group, a capitalist group, all sorts of groups—lack of harmony of purpose and lack of unity of thought. Here are the representatives of little papers down in Georgia and Tennessee and various other States asking that they shall have a zone system. Why? So they may locally compete with the newspapers from the great centers, so that they can localize and denationalize the news. I am not a great nationalist; I never even spell the word "nation" with a capital "N." I am, rather, in favor of a whole lot of local individualism, not only for the person but for the county and State; but I have no sort of sympathy at all with him who wants to give the county paper an advantage over the New York World. That is at the bottom of this business to a very large extent.

I was talking with a very distinguished Democrat the other day, a member of the Democratic executive committee and also the editor and proprietor of several rural local newspapers. He was very much in favor of the zone system, and before he got through with the argument he disclosed the fact that if we had the zone system his newspapers would have an advantage over the St. Louis Republic and the Post Dispatch, the New York Herald and the Times, the Chicago Tribune, and various other papers.

I know it is quite natural for us to be afraid of these papers. I am afraid of them myself. God knows if they told the truth about me I would have an awful time. But I am not going to act like a coward on this floor and let them scare me. That is a different proposition.

Another thing, Mr. President: "Whom the gods would ruin they first make mad." Now, let me tell these gentlemen if they do not quit obstructing every possible effort that has been made for them to pay their just and fair share of taxes they will meet with ruin sure enough; we may conclude to raise second-class postage to its right rate, and when we do that at least half of them will go out of business. They have lived upon the bounty, they have lived upon the gratuity, they have lived upon the gift, and they can not live without it.

What is the history of this legislation? The House brought us a proposition for a zone system and these publishers' lobbyists said, "We are more afraid of that than anything else. For God's sake, take that cup from our lips. Do not let us have to swallow that." The Senate committee proceeded to subject them to a gross-receipts tax, and they said, "For God's sake, that cup is bitterer than the other."

Who is standing behind the Hardwick amendment? Who is standing behind the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee? Where do you find newspaper men who are consenting to any tax whatsoever? The only man who is thoroughly representative of the newspapers and magazines on this floor whom I have heard is the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. He denounced the House provision, the Hardwick provision, the provision of the Senator from Tennessee, and the provision of the Finance Committee, all of them, as wrong, upon the theory that they constitute "a special and discriminatory tax," calling by the name of a tax a little bit of modest and half-cowardly effort of our committee to get back by the most favorable report not over one-half of an actual annual gratuity.

Now, of course, when this war is over and we are able to give bounties out of the Treasury I am willing to continue the gratuity, because I do believe in this, and I believe in it with all my heart, that the temple of democracy is based upon the pillars of freedom and equality and justice and intelligence, and if the temple had two stories all three of the pillars would be in the second story, and a great basis, a great immense supporting column of intelligence, would be at the bottom.

Old Thomas Jefferson, my patron saint, all the time believed in an aristocracy, but "an aristocracy of intelligence," and he believed in giving the people, all of them, the opportunity to be "aristocrats of intelligence," and feared that democracy could not exist—fraternity, equality, and liberty could not exist—without popular and nearly universal intelligence.

But during this short war, two or three years more—possibly seven, not over that, an inconsequential period in the history of the world—let these people pay their share of the tax. Let that crowd who in the Finance Committee applauded the man who said that they were "willing to give all their profits to the country if necessary" subside and say to the Finance Committee, "You have done better by us than we suggested; instead of taking all our profits you have taken only one-twentieth, and that one-twentieth is only one-half of what we are getting from you every year as a gratuity, even if $30,000,000 a year is all that you are paying us. Some people calculate that you are paying us annually sixty millions."

It does seem to me, Mr. President, that they ought to be ashamed of themselves. They ought to quit. They ought not to have apologists and lobbyists here. Senators and Representatives speaking for them ought to say to them, "The Finance Committee has treated you a lot better than you asked, and we have not found a thing that you propose to do in order to return to the Treasury, even partially, the bounty that you are receiving." They have opposed every proposition—the House proposition, the Hardwick proposition, the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee, the Finance Committee's first proposition, the Finance Committee's second proposition, and they have offered nothing as a substitute, not a thing in the world. They have said in effect, "The country and its taxpayers give us some $30,000,000 or $60,000,000 a year, and we want it to keep on giving it, and if you do not you are going to feel the weight of the press." That does, or ought to, frighten me; therefore I conclude.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] as amended to the amendment of the committee, on which the yeas and nays have been demanded and seconded.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the other day I spoke somewhat fully upon this subject. I do not care to take the time of the Senate now save to present some four or five telegrams which came from newspapers in the State of Ohio. One is from the Cincinnati Times-Star, of which Mr. Charles P. Taft is the owner and editor; another one is from the Dayton News, another from the Springfield News, papers which are owned by Gov. Cox, of Ohio; another one is from the Newark Advocate; and another one is from the Daily Republican News, of Butler County. In substance these telegrams favor the McKellar amendment and are opposed to the 5 per cent tax. I will not take the time to read them, but I ask unanimous consent to incorporate them in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, it is so ordered.

The telegrams are as follows:

CINCINNATI, OHIO, August 27, 1917.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We heartily indorse Senator MCKELLAR'S postage amendment. Kindly support same. We emphatically oppose 5 per cent tax on earnings.

THE CINCINNATI TIMES-STAR CO.,
C. H. REMBOLD, Manager.

DAYTON, OHIO, August 27, 1917.

Senator ATLEE POMERENE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Dayton (Ohio) News strongly favors McKellar amendment, as fairest to greatest number of publishers.

ORVILLE HARRINGTON, Business Manager.

SPRINGFIELD, OHIO, August 27, 1917.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We ask your support for McKellar amendment; and oppose 5 per cent tax on earnings.

THE SPRINGFIELD OHIO NEWS.

NEWARK, OHIO, August 27, 1917.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
Washington, D. C.:

Would be glad to have you support McKellar amendment.

THE NEWARK ADVOCATE.

HAMILTON, OHIO, August 28, 1917.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The newspapers in Butler County all unit in urging your support of the McKellar amendment in place of the 5 per cent tax on earnings. We trust you will find this request consistent with your own views.

DAILY REPUBLICAN NEWS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] as amended to the amendment of the committee.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "yea."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. By an arrangement with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and vote "nay."

Mr. HARDING (when his name was called). Mr. President, about all the material possessions I have in the world are involved in a newspaper. I therefore, being personally concerned with the action of the Senate, will ask to be excused from voting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Shall the Senator from Ohio be excused from voting? [After a pause.] He will be excused from voting.

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] has a pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. By an arrangement the Senator from Montana will stand paired with the Senator from Wyoming, which permits the Senator from New Jersey and myself to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I will withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce the necessary absence of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and because of illness of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. The latter Senator is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF].

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. He is paired.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Has the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland and am compelled to withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. MCCUMBER. I have a general pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], and being unable to obtain a transfer I withhold my vote.

Mr. KELLOGG (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Minnesota withdrew his vote on account of his pair with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I heard the Senator from Utah state that he would vote for the McKellar amendment.

Mr. LEWIS. I neglected to state and I wish now the RECORD to show the absence of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] on account of illness in his family, and the absence of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] on official business. If the Senator from Kansas were present and not paired, he would vote for the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

Mr. STONE. I desire for the day to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. REED], who has been called from the city on important business. I do not know how he would vote upon this question.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the pair of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

The result was announced—yeas 40, nays 35, as follows:

YEAS—40.

So Mr. MCKELLAR'S amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to reserve the right for a separate vote upon the amendment just adopted when the bill reaches the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 96, line 11, to change the number of the section from "1202" to "1102," and in line 16, after the word "publication," to strike out "Provided, That the Postmaster General may hereafter require publishers to separate or make up to zones in such a manner as he may direct all mail matter of the second class when offered for mailing," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 1102. That the rate of postage on daily newspapers, when the same are deposited in a letter-carrier office for delivery by its carriers, shall be the same as now provided by law; and nothing in this title shall affect existing law as to free circulation and existing rates on second-class mail matter within the county of publication.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 96, after line 19, to strike out:

SEC. 1203. That in the case of newspapers and periodicals entitled to be entered as second-class matter and maintained by and in the interest of religious, educational, scientific, philanthropic, agricultural, labor, or fraternal organizations or associations, not organized for profit and none of the net income of which inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual, the second-class postage rates shall be, irrespective of the zone in which delivered (except when the same are deposited in a letter-carrier office for delivery by its carriers, in which case the rates shall be the same as now provided by law), 1½ cents a pound or fraction thereof from July 1, 1917, until March 1, 1918, and thereafter 1½ cents a pound or fraction thereof. The publishers of such newspapers and periodicals before being entitled to the foregoing rates shall furnish to the Postmaster General, at such times and under such conditions as he may prescribe, satisfactory evidence that none of the net income of such organization inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 97, after line 13, to strike out:

SEC. 1204. That where the total weight of any one edition or issue of any publication mailed to any one zone does not exceed 1 pound, the rate of postage shall be 1 cent for each 8 ounces or fraction thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 97, after line 17, to strike out:

SEC. 1205. The rates provided by this title shall relate to the entire bulk mailed to any one zone and not to individually addressed packages.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 97, line 21, to change the number of the section from "1206" to "1103"; in line 22, after the word "publisher," to strike out "or his agent"; and in line 23, after the word "agent," to strike out "or dealer," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 1103. That where a newspaper or periodical is mailed by other than the publisher or a news agent, the rate shall be the same as now provided by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 98, line 1, to change the number of the section from "1207" to "1104," and in line 8, after the words "of the," to strike out "passage" and insert "enactment," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 1104. That the Postmaster General, on or before the 10th day of each month, shall pay into the general fund of the Treasury an amount equal to the difference between the estimated amount received during the preceding month for the transportation of first and second class matter through the mails and the estimated amount which would have been received under the provisions of the law in force at the time of the enactment of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Section 1105 has been passed upon by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The next amendment was, on page 98, after line 21, to insert:

SEC. 1106. That in addition to the taxes under existing law and under this act there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid, for the calendar year 1917 and each calendar year thereafter, upon the net income of every individual, corporation, partnership, or association arising from the publication of newspapers, magazines, or periodicals entitled to be entered as second-class mail matter (whether or not so entered), a tax of 5 per cent of the amount of such net income in excess of $4,000.

For the purposes of this section net income shall be determined upon the same basis and in the same manner as provided in Title I of the act entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September 8, 1916, in so far as such title is applicable. The provisions of section 4 of this act with respect to a tax for a fiscal year ending during the calendar year 1917 shall also apply to the tax imposed by this section upon a corporation or partnership.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the greater part of what I am about to say might appropriately be said as a matter of personal privilege.

During the earlier weeks of this month of August I was grossly assailed and insulted by a number of metropolitan journals somewhat widely scattered over the country, including several in my own State. I do not recall, however, that I have at any time risen to a question of personal privilege to reply to a newspaper attack. The fact is I am rarely conscious of them. It has been my uniform policy to allow such things to pass by without a word, confident that those who know me would place their own estimate upon the motives, the character, and the veracity of the attack. Moreover, if I should undertake as a matter of personal privilege to respond to newspaper attacks I would be too often diverted from the consideration of important duties. Nevertheless, while I put aside the question of personal privilege, I have thought that while the particular provisions of this bill affecting newspapers are under consideration it would be an opportune occasion to say something by way of reply to the attacks to which I have referred and to follow that with some brief observations relating to those particular provisions, and especially with respect to my attitude regarding them.

Mr. President, as preliminary to and explanatory of the remarks I am about to make, I desire to lay before the Senate the basis of these attacks to which I have referred. During the first half of the present month I submitted to the Senate a communication addressed to me by Mr. Amos Pinchot and others and asked that it might be read for the information of the Senate. I ask the Secretary to again read that communication.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

JULY 29, 1917.

HON. WILLIAM J. STONE,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Relations,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR STONE: Some of the recent discussions in the Senate prompt us to ask you, as chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, to introduce a concurrent resolution in the Senate which would enable Congress to state its conception of the proper basis for peace negotiations. We are submitting a purely tentative draft of such a resolution. Our reasons for urging immediate action are these:

It can hardly be denied that the German peace resolution, carried in the Reichstag on July 19 by a vote of 214 to 116, is an attempt on the part of the German people to express their willingness to enter into peace negotiations on the basis of "no annexations and no indemnities." The express language of the resolution leaves no room for doubt:

"The Reichstag labors for peace and a mutual understanding and lasting reconciliation among the nations. Forced acquisitions of territory and political, economic, and financial violations are incompatible with such a peace."

The Reichstag, though not, in the democratic sense, a truly representative body, is, nevertheless, the only political body through which the German people can speak to the rest of the world. Through it they have spoken by an overwhelming majority and in unmistakable terms, disclaiming conquest and indemnities, claiming only their national integrity, professing their desire to join in an international organization for a lasting world peace. To ignore this resolution is to prove all our protestations of friendship for the German people false.

If we genuinely desire to strengthen the hand of the German people against autocracy, this is our opportunity; we must receive the Reichstag resolution with official respect and ignore the speech of the chancellor, who is responsible only to the Kaiser.

We urge action by congressional resolution in this matter, because we believe it is high time for the parliament of the world to take a hand in the business of making peace. Continually called upon to approve war policies and vote war appropriations, the peoples' representatives, with the exception of Russia and now Germany, have not declared their terms of peace.

Respectfully, yours,

AMOS PINCHOT,
LILLIAN D. WALD,
L. HOLLINGSWORTH WOOD,
MAX EASTMAN,
JOHN HAYNES HOLMES,
ROGER N. BALDWIN,
NORMAN M. THOMAS,
CHARLES T. HALLINAN,
JOHN L. ELLIOTT,
ALICE LEWISOHN.
CRYSTAL EASTMAN,

For the American Union Against Militarism.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, at the time I submitted this paper I made a few brief remarks, which appear in the RECORD. I ask the Secretary to do me the favor of reading what I said at that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, just a word. This communication comes to me in an official way as the chairman of one of the committees of the Senate. As it comes from citizens of undoubted respectable character and responsibility, I have thought proper to submit it to the Senate. I make no observation upon it at this time. I have had it read and ask that it may lie upon the table, for I desire to make some observations respecting the communication at an early and convenient day. I am not prepared to proceed this morning. I shall hope during the coming week to find an opportunity to say something with respect to the request of these ladies and gentlemen, and with respect to the subject about which they ask me in my official capacity to take some action.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, what the Secretary has read covers everything said or done at that time with respect to this matter, and it has not since been referred to in the Senate; that is all there is to it; but what I did say on that occasion appears to have so jarred the sensibilities of certain editors of a certain type of newspapers as to have thrown them into a real "conniption fit," if I may be pardoned for using a pertinent slang expression. Numerous clippings from these newspapers have been sent to me. I am such a poor reader of metropolitan newspapers that I would not, except for the interest displayed by those who mailed me these editorial ebullitions, have known that I had innocently excited a teapot tempest, nor have known of the assaults made upon me.

WHAT IS THE INFLUENCE OR MOTIVE?

These intolerant editors assumed that I intended to do things and say things that I did not intend to do or say. Some of them assumed, even asserted, that I intended to offer a resolution, or series of resolutions, outlining and proposing definite and specific terms of peace, even to the extent of advising the President what he should do in the premises. Some went even so far as to say I had actually proposed such a resolution. Now, all that was purely imaginary. I never at any time had any thought of doing that. I have had the Secretary read the paper I presented and exactly what I said at the time I presented it, and that is all I have ever said respecting the subject. These newspapers built their own man of straw to knock down. Because of what I did, or they said I did, but which I did not do, some of these editors have denounced me in libelous terms, and put their artists to the task of caricaturing me in the most offensive form. Merely because I presented this communication just read in your hearing, remarking only that I had in mind at a later date to say something about it, epithets and cartoons have been employed to put me before the readers of these publications as a slacker—I am using the terms of these editorials—a traitor, a German sympathizer, and even as a German spy.

Mr. President, seriously, is there not some sinister influence behind this sort of thing? Those who sent me the communication I had printed in the RECORD are honorable men and women, representative men and women, American-born men and women, of high personal character and intelligence. Have we come to the point that it is to be regarded as lese majeste, or as some form of public offense, for a Senator to lay before this body a respectful communication upon any subject addressed to him by men and women of the type of those whose names are appended to the paper I presented?

I submitted this communication just as Senators every day submit communications of widely different kinds relating to the war. They are so submitted by Senators on the ground that they are in the nature of petitions, and the right of petition still remains as one of the rights of the people guaranteed by the Constitution. But at the time I laid this particular communication before the Senate I said nothing by way of approval or disapproval of the text, and yet these vile publications have hounded me in the way I have stated. Mr. President, again I ask, What influence operates to prod this numerous class of metropolitan editors into this mad intolerance?

Lord Northcliffe, who owns the London Times and other important English publications, is honoring the United States by a temporary residence in our midst. He comes from England under some form of official sanction—exactly what it is I do not know—but he has a commission of some kind, and it is said that the principal object of his mission is to influence the American press for the promotion of the interests he represents. If, indeed, that be the object of his mission, I feel obliged to say that up to this time his labors have been crowned with marked success. Can it be that a Senator or Representative in Congress, or a public man in any position, is in daily danger of being pilloried before the American people whenever he is audacious enough to do or say anything that does not pass with approval the exacting test of my Lord Northcliffe's American censorship?

Mr. President, I will not comment to any great extent upon this most recent storm of scurrility which has beaten upon me—a storm started out of the depths of my grave offense in presuming to present a peace petition to the Senate. If I am correctly informed, as I believe I am, some of the editors who have indulged in these scandalous denunciations of me are unnaturalized residents of the United States who owe allegiance to King George V. Such men, instead of serving their country on the battle front, seek the hospitality of the United States and abuse it by vilifying American public officials who do not happen in all respects to accord with their views and purposes. Perhaps my Lord Northcliffe and others of his caste believe that these foreign editors so working here do better service in this way—that is to say, in striving to control American public opinion—than they could do in shooting their armed enemies along the trench lines. They are employed to fire fusillades of a different kind.

NEED NOT DEFEND MY AMERICANISM.

Mr. President, I am not required, it is not incumbent upon me, to defend my loyalty or Americanism. I am to the manner born. The great fundamental principles of democracy taught by George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, and their coadjutors were born in me. That is an inseparable part of my life. My forbears came to the American Colonies long before the Revolution, and during the perilous days of that desperate fight for liberty they were patriots, not Tories.

Some of these editors charge me with being a German sympathizer and abettor. This charge is too ludicrous for me specially to deny. Sir, I have not a drop of German blood in my veins, except, perhaps, such trace of it as is common to the composite English race. The blood pulsing in my heart is purer English by far than that which runs through the veins of George V, who now rules by divine right as King of Great Britain, Ireland, and the Dominions Beyond the Seas, and as Emperor of India. My blood is purer English than his. I am not boasting of my origin; I merely speak of the fact, and except for the circumstances would not speak of it at all. However, having spoken of it, I want to say that I am proud of my English blood. As a great, puissant, onward-moving people the English-speaking peoples, in my opinion, are not excelled. No other peoples, in my opinion, have done more than the English-speaking peoples for the cause of good government and liberty throughout the world. And this I say notwithstanding the known fact that the history of English progress and achievement—I speak now especially of the English of England, not of the English-speaking peoples as a whole—has been marked so often and in so many ways with tears and blood and the wreck of hopes as to deserve the condemnation of righteous men; but, notwithstanding that, the essential ideals of the English-speaking peoples, taken as a whole and judged as a whole on the basis of ultimate results, have been high ideals, and, despite the evils some of these peoples have done, in the aggregate the things wrought by the English-speaking peoples for the good of mankind have not been surpassed, if equaled, by things done in that way by any other race inhabiting the earth. To these fundamental ideals I am immovably devoted.

Mr. President, I would willingly go to war—even into a world war—to preserve the civilization of the English-speaking peoples of the world—what I may call our Anglo-Saxon civilization—if for a moment I believed that that civilization was imperiled. But when men tell us, as they do daily, that that civilization is imperiled, necessarily imperiled, even in England, to say nothing of the United States, by this present war, they tell us something which I regard as so puerile, so inane, if not insane, so utterly impossible, that I can not characterize it in parliamentary terms. I speak not now of the danger of possible backsets springing from the outreaching grasp of any nation, English or Teuton. My thought for the moment is fixed only on the possibility of a real danger to the civilization of our people—our people—such a danger as we would be compelled to meet with bloody resistance. To my thinking all this talk to the effect that we are now confronting such a danger is just talk indulged in for ulterior purposes. It hath too much of the Northcliffe twang. Sir, it is an old story in statecraft that ambitious builders of great programs say things to induce the more simple, the more trustful and unsuspecting, to do other things the wiser ones wish them to do.

GERMAN VOTE IN MISSOURI.

Some of these sapient editors who are for war to the bitter end at any price, being more conservative than some others, do not accuse me of being actually German, but do accuse me of being controlled or influenced by the fact that there is a considerable German vote in Missouri. I can not believe that these men themselves believe what they say; many are unfamiliar with things of which they speak; they are merely reckless in accusation. Perhaps some of them think they can overawe me, or maybe think they can fool the people. They may fool the people, but they can not overawe me. It is a fact that there is a considerable so-called German vote in Missouri, but there is also a considerable so-called Italian, Polish, and Russian vote in that State, and, in the aggregate, a very considerable number of voters descended from other European nationalities. That is true because Missouri, as you know, is one of the big, representative States of the Union and its population is cosmopolitan. I have sought for years by argument and persuasion to make Democrats of all these people, but beyond that I have not gone. So far as the German-Americans are concerned, my efforts, and the efforts of my party associates, in this behalf have not been signalized by any shining success. It is safe to say that at least 65 to 70 per cent of the German-American vote in Missouri is, and for a long time has been, steadfastly loyal to the Republican Party. It is worse than idiocy—for it is not short of malevolent mendacity—for anyone to ascribe to me any such motive as that alluded to as the basis of my attitude with respect to any phase of this war. True, I have personal and political friends among the German-Americans in Missouri, whose repeated acts of kindness I esteem more highly than I need try to express. For these men, and all others situated as they are, I sympathize because of their special environment; and so, Mr. President, does every Senator here sympathize with them; I have heard many so declare on this floor. I do not think the loyalty of these men needs defense; but, in passing, I will say that I agree with the President in his recent utterance to the effect that, taken as a body, the German-Americans are as loyal and patriotic as any other class of our citizens. Moreover, I know that they are a highly intelligent people, rather fixed in their opinions and not easily swayed to change them.

Mr. President, aside from any question of patriotism or duty, and descending for the moment to the lower plane from which these editors have discussed me, I flatter myself that I have too much common sense, too much political experience, too wide a knowledge of human nature to be fool enough to court the German vote in Missouri for myself or my party by playing a contemptible game of small politics in dealing with the most momentous questions with which our Nation has perhaps ever been confronted. That would be one of the last things I would think of attempting. I would not think of attempting it for this reason if no other—that such an attempt would be destined in advance to utter failure.

Mr. President, I am approaching the allotted period of threescore and ten; I have grown gray in the public service; the people of my State have showered upon me about all the honors within their power to confer. I do not know that they will even care to have me serve them longer, and that is not of great importance; but, sir, as long as I do stand here by their authority I shall at all hazards do what I believe to be best for them and for our country. I need not say to the metropolitan papers of Missouri—I say especially those of Missouri—that it is impossible for them to extend toward me a menacing hand that would carry dread to my heart. The editors of these papers in Missouri know that, whatever editors in other sections of the country may think about it. I indulge in no idle boasting; I throw no gage of battle or defiance; but I do say, with some sense of pride, that the people of Missouri know that in my long public service I have never feared or hesitated to say or do what I believed was right; and they also know that the bulldozing tactics of great newspapers have weighed as lightly as a feather with me.

ACCUSED OF OBSTRUCTION.

Some of these editors also accuse me of being an obstructionist. They charge that I am generally found obstinately opposing what they call "the President's war measures." This, Senators, you know is untrue. I did oppose the program suddenly projected upon us to have the United States enter as a belligerent into this European war. I gave my reasons for that position, and it is not necessary to repeat them further than to say that every day I live confirms me in the wisdom of the position I assumed and urged at that time. But when the Congress, which under the Constitution is the war-making power, declared for war I stated from my place on this floor that, while I could not change my convictions, I would surrender to the will and judgment of my Government, and that henceforth I would support, as far as I could with reasonable respect to my oath of office and the responsibilities of my position, all such measures as the President and his advisers in Congress and the Cabinet deemed necessary to the successful prosecution of the war in which they had involved us. That pledge I have kept. I challenge any man to disprove the absolute accuracy of this statement.

Since we declared war and entered upon this terrible enterprise, what are the principal so-called "war measures" which the Congress have been called upon to enact? They were bills to increase the Regular Army in all its lines to maximum strength; bills practically granting to the Executive the power to commandeer manufacturing plants and transportation facilities; bills authorizing the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars for the quick construction of merchant ships to meet the ravages of German submarines; bills appropriating hundreds of millions to create the greatest aviation fleet in the world; the espionage bill; bills to raise billions of revenue by bond issues and taxation; bills to authorize the loan of billions of dollars to the entente allied nations; bills appropriating billions of dollars for all kinds of war purposes, and so on, and so forth.

CONSCRIPTION BILL.

Mr. President, I voted for all the measures I have named, and for many others I might particularize—voted for them because they were put forward as "war measures." As to several of them I not only voted for them, but spoke in support of their passage. I took and have adhered to the position that as long as we are in war I would vote to give the Government practically everything they asked and deemed essential to the prosecution of the war.

Mr. President, I even voted for the conscription bill, although it was a hard thing for me to do. I did not like to force our young men into the war, but I voted for that bill because I believed that that was the only way we could raise an army of sufficient strength to carry on the war, and I so said on this floor, advocating the passage of the bill. If an army of 2,000,000 or even 1,000,000 men could have been raised by voluntary enlistment—if the President and his advisers had believed that such an army could have been so enlisted—there would have been no demand for the draft. I agreed with them that no such volunteer army could be raised for service in this European war, and yet an army of that magnitude was evidently necessary if we were to wage effectively the war we had declared. Right or wrong, I voted for that bill, and spoke in favor of its passage as an absolutely necessary war measure.

FOOD BILL.

I also voted for the food and fuel conservation bill—the Hoover bill, so called—and spoke in favor of its passage. I did vote for two amendments to that bill, namely, first, to create a board of three men to be appointed by the President to administer the enormous and really dangerous powers conferred by the bill, instead of clothing one man with that tremendous authority; and, secondly, I voted to amend the bill by creating a congressional committee to be composed of five Senators and five Representatives, clothed with authority to keep account of the actual expenditures of the billions of money the Congress is appropriating, and which is to be expended by all kinds of executive officials.

A decided majority of the Senate favored both these amendments, but, to my astonishment, it later appeared that the President did not favor these amendments; and so, when the bill went to conference between the two Houses and the conferees agreed to and reported back to their respective Houses a recommendation to strike these two amendments from the bill, I gave way and voted to strike them out.

SENATOR REED.

Mr. President, I can not pass this point without pausing to express my approval of what the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] said of my colleague [Mr. REED] just preceding the close of the debate and final vote on the conference report which ended the consideration of this food bill. Agreeing with the Senator from Pennsylvania, I wish to say that the stand taken by my colleague and some other Senators—but especially by my colleague—in opposition to some features of that bill and of the conference report well deserved the generous compliment paid him by the Senator from Pennsylvania; and I wish to add that while, like the Senator from Pennsylvania, I did not think it best in the final analysis to resist the adoption of the conference report, I do not hesitate to testify that the work done by my colleague and others working with him to amend the bill so as to make it better accord with American ideas of popular government deserves the thanks, not the condemnation, of the Congress and the people. For this reason, if no other, I say that what these Senators persisted in doing, or trying to do, was a brave stand made in the face of extraordinary difficulties to vindicate the independence of congressional action.

REVENUE BILL.

Mr. President, I am a member of the Senate Committee on Finance—next to the chairman, the ranking member. That committee has had to deal with bills involving the difficult problem of raising revenue—billions of dollars of revenue—to meet the expenses incident to the war. One of those bills, the last one that committee has considered, which itself provides for raising over $2,000,000,000 of revenue by taxation—not bonds, but immediate taxation—is now before the Senate. In my work on that committee I am willing for any member of that body to say whether I have been diligent, faithful, and patriotic, or in any way fallen short of my duty. I am willing to leave the decision of that question to the judgment of that committee—aye, to the judgment of any single member of that committee, Democrat or Republican.

Mr. President, stated generally, this is my record made in support of the "war measures of the administration." Therefore am I not well warranted in denouncing any statement made by any editor or other man that I have stood in the way and obstructed the enactment of so-called war measures deemed necessary to the prosecution of the war as a baseless calumny?

AS TO NEWSPAPER ATTACKS.

Mr. President, it might be interesting for you to know that at the very time this pitiless storm of editorial scurrility was beating upon me the provisions of this revenue bill which particularly affect the newspapers were under consideration by the Finance Committee. As the bill came from the House to the Finance Committee it doubled the postage rate on second-class matter, which includes newspapers, and applied what is known as the zone system. At once the great newspapers and other publications arose almost en masse to protest. A large number of representatives of these publications came before the Finance Committee to convince the committee membership that the House provision would not only seriously embarrass these publications but would absolutely destroy a large number of them. Patiently I heard these arguments and read the briefs submitted. I became convinced that the contention of the publishers was well founded.

Mr. President, it is a rare thing that I ever refer to what occurs in the executive sessions of a committee of which I am a member, for aside from any rule or practice in that behalf I think the members of a committee should not make its proceedings the subject of public discussion. But in the peculiar circumstances surrounding the present consideration, I think I will be at least excused, if not justified, if I refer to my own attitude with respect to these particular newspaper provisions of the bill while they were being considered by the committee. I believed that because of commercial reasons, increased cost of print paper and other things, it would not be just to increase the postal rates on newspaper publications at the present time, whatever might properly be done in that behalf at a later day. Therefore before the committee I earnestly and persistently supported a motion to strike out the increased zone postal rate prescribed by the House bill. At one point in the committee proceedings that motion prevailed, as I recall it, but later upon reconsideration the provision now in the bill, making a flat increase of one-fourth of 1 cent per pound on second-class matter, without applying the zone system, was agreed to by a majority committee vote. I opposed that and voted against it. I opposed any increase in the rates.

After that, or in connection with that, came the proposition to levy a special flat tax on the net incomes of newspapers as a sort of compensation to the Government for the mail privileges these publications enjoy. The big publications of the country, with few exceptions, had, through their representatives appearing before the committee, opposed any increase of postal rates, and I thought gave sound reasons for their contention. At the same time, standing as within a shining halo of patriotism, these publishers, as the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has said, declared their willingness to pay a tax on their net incomes, even to the point of giving the whole of them if necessary in the judgment of the committee and the Congress.

I do not now recall that more than two or three of these big fellows objected to that. Indeed, on the contrary, they seemed willing to pay the tax on net incomes if only the postage rates were left undisturbed. It soon became evident that a majority of the committee favored the imposition of this tax. As expressive of my personal attitude, I proposed an amendment to this general effect—that publications with a net annual income of less than $4,000 and certain specified classes of publications, such as religious, scientific, purely agricultural, labor, and fraternal, should be exempted from the tax; and that as to the remainder the tax should be graduated so as to impose a tax of 1 per cent on the first bracket, and from that basis proceed along the rising scale so as not to make the burden at this unpropitious time too heavy, and especially not too heavy on the smaller and weaker publications. Generally speaking, that was my personal attitude, and substantially I adhered to it throughout the whole consideration of the subject.

Mr. President, I have with some hesitancy ventured to make this statement as to my individual effort before the committee. Of course I do not pretend that my effort was potential as an influence on the action of the committee, but that influence for whatever it was worth was exerted to prevent an increase in these particular postal rates at this time, and to make the tax on net receipts lighter in its general effect, especially upon those least able to bear it, than the tax as proposed and even as finally recommended by the committee.

And so, Mr. President, while these newspapers were hounding me without my knowledge, doing me, as I have shown, a gross injustice, I was striving to so frame the bill as to approach the nearest point possible of absolute justice to the publishers as I saw it. I have said this to contrast the attitude of a publisher having special interests to promote and a legislator who seeks only to discharge a public duty.

Let me not be misunderstood. Whatever I attempted, resulting in at least partial success, was not done out of any special consideration for the publishers. If I had allowed personal considerations to influence me, it is possible that resentment, because of frequent outrages, might have weighed in the balance. But my colleagues on the committee know that I cast all such considerations aside, as I am sure they did, and viewed the question before us solely from the point of right and justice.

Mr. President, these provisions of the bill were not framed in exact accordance with my desire. But these provisions, like all of the provisions of the bill, are brought to the Senate as the result of patient, sincere, and earnest effort on the part of the committee to arrive at correct conclusions. After weeks of effort the committee by a practically unanimous vote directed the chairman to report this bill. As I have heretofore said, the bill is not in the exact form in which I would have written it, nor is it in the exact form in which any member of the committee would have written it. But the bill the chairman has reported is the result of work done by men whose capacity will not be impugned. Taken as a whole, I believe it to be a most excellent measure, and that it very adequately meets the requirements of the immediate exigency. What the Finance Committee has done for publishers is undoubtedly greatly to their advantage as compared with the provisions of the House bill. Considering the fact that this bill must go back to the House, and must be made the subject of conference, I submit that Senators who do not prefer the House bill to the Senate bill should exercise some care and foresight. For myself, I shall support the bill the Committee on Finance directed its chairman to report.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, in view of the action of the Committee of the Whole in adopting the amendment regarding postal rates it seems to me I should not insist upon the adoption of section 1106 as reported by the committee. I do not believe that this section if adopted would be in keeping with the general policy which the committee has tried to keep in mind in the amendments already adopted. I shall therefore not insist upon the adoption of the pending amendment, and I shall not ask for a roll call. I am not authorized, of course, to withdraw the amendment, as the committee has had no meeting.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, since the adoption of what is called the McKellar amendment, taking this section in connection with it, it would be an absolute injustice for the Senate to adopt section 1106 as reported to the Senate by the committee, and while the committee has not taken action as a committee, I fully agree with the Senator from New Mexico that it ought to be stricken from the bill. I hope when a vote is taken that the Senate will disagree to the committee amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, we have practically acted upon this provision already. This provision was identified with the other provision recommended by the committee which placed an increase of one-fourth upon the rate of second-class postage. This 5 per cent placed upon publishers was intended with that one-fourth to be in recognition of the excess expense which second-class mail places upon the Government for its transportation. Having adopted the McKellar amendment as a substitute for the one-fourth provision, we raise $12,000,000 in that way, and I think everyone will agree that that vote should logically be followed by the rejection of this amendment of the committee.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I very much favored the increase in postage on second-class mail because I felt that the old law was a great piece of favoritism to the publishers. The amendment embraced in section 1106 is a gross discrimination against the publishers, and whether the McKellar amendment had been adopted or not I would have voted against this section 1106. I can not understand myself why there should have been this attempt at discrimination, and I am very glad to hear the members of the Finance Committee suggest that it should be eliminated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, in behalf of the Finance Committee, I wish to perfect certain portions of the amendments, or rather the substitute, proposed by the committee for the war-profits tax title of the bill. Senators will recall that the Finance Committee struck out the whole of that title of the bill and reported new sections to take its place. There are quite a number of these changes.

Mr. POMERENE. I wish to suggest to the chairman of the committee, as evidently he is about to give us a modification of the bill as originally reported, and it is a matter evidently of very vital importance, might it not be well to suggest the absence of a quorum, so that we may hear his explanation, particularly if we are to have any vote upon this subject to-night?

Mr. SIMMONS. I had not expected to enter into any explanation of these changes this afternoon. I was simply proposing this afternoon to perfect the amendments that we have made and then I was going to suggest a reprint. I think there ought to be a reprint, because it does make very substantial changes in the bill.

Mr. POMERENE. In view of that explanation, I will not make the point of no quorum.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that the Secretary may read the proposed changes in the amendments heretofore offered by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

On page 13, line 19, strike out the word "and."

On page 13, line 22, strike out the period and insert the words "and do not exceed 300 per cent thereof; and."

On page 13 after line 22, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"Sixty per cent of the amount by which such war profits exceed 300 per cent of such deduction."

On pages 15 and 16 strike out section 203 and insert the following:

"SEC. 203. That for the purposes of this title the amount of war profits shall be determined, except as otherwise in this title provided—

"(a) In the case of a domestic corporation or partnership or of a citizen or resident of the United States by deducting from the net income of the trade or business received during the taxable year the average amount of the annual net income of the trade or business during the prewar period; but such deduction shall not be an amount less than 6 or more than 10 per cent of the actual invested capital as of January 1 of the taxable year.

"(b) In the case of a foreign corporation or partnership or of a nonresident alien individual, by deducting from the net income of the trade or business received from sources within the United States during the taxable year the average amount of the annual net income of the trade or business from sources within the United States during the prewar period; but such deduction shall not be an amount less than 6 or more than 10 per cent of that proportion of the actual invested capital as of January 1 of the taxable year which the net income of the trade or business from sources within the United States bears to the entire net income.

"(c) If the capital (or in the case of a foreign corporation or partnership or of a nonresident alien individual that proportion thereof which the net income of the trade or business from sources within the United States bears to the entire net income) during the taxable year is greater or less than the average capital computed upon the same basis, during the prewar period, the war profits shall be determined by deducting from the total net income for the taxable year an amount which bears the same proportion to the average annual net income for the prewar period which such capital during the taxable year bears to such average capital during the prewar period; but such deduction shall not be an amount less than 6 or more than 10 per cent of the actual invested capital as of January 1 of the taxable year (or in the case of a foreign corporation or partnership or of a nonresident alien individual of that portion of the actual invested capital as of January 1 of the taxable year which the net income of the trade or business from sources within the United States bears to the entire net income).

"(d) If the Secretary of the Treasury is unable satisfactorily to determine the average amount of the annual net income of the trade or business during the prewar period or the actual invested capital as of January 1 of the taxable year, the war profits shall be determined as provided in subdivision (a) of section 204."

On page 16, line 14, before the word "That," insert the letter "a" in parentheses.

On page 17, strike out lines 23 to 25, and lines 1 to 8 on page 18, and insert:

"(b) If the net income of the trade or business for the taxable year, in the case of a corporation or partnership which was not in existence, or of an individual who was not engaged in the trade or business during the whole of any one calendar year during the prewar period, is less than 6 per cent per annum of the actual invested capital as of January 1 of the taxable year (or in case of a foreign corporation or partnership or a nonresident alien individual is less than 6 per cent per annum on that proportion of the actual invested capital as of January 1 of the taxable year which the net income of the trade or business from sources within the United States bears to the entire net income) there shall be deemed to be no war profits."

On page 18, line 21, after the words "provided in," insert the words "subdivision (a) of."

On page 19, line 10, after the word "in," insert the words "subdivision (a) of."

On page 21, after line 21, insert:

"SEC. 207. As used in section 203 and in subdivision (b) of section 204, the term "capital" does not include money or other property borrowed, and in case of a corporation or partnership means, subject to the above limitation, (1) actual cash paid in; (2) the actual cash value of property paid in, other than cash, or for stocks or shares in such corporation or partnership, at the time of such payment; and (3) paid-in or earned surplus and undivided profits used or employed in the business: Provided, That the good will, including the trade-marks and trade brands, or the franchise of a corporation or partnership, is not to be included unless the corporation or partnership made payment therefor specifically as such in cash or tangible property, the value of such good will, trade-marks, trade brands, or franchise not to exceed the actual cash or actual value of the tangible property paid therefor at the time of such payment."

On page 21, line 22, strike out the figures "207" and insert the figures "208."

On page 22, line 3, strike out the figures "208" and insert the figures "209."

On page 22, line 13, strike out the figures "209" and insert the figures "210."

On page 22, line 24, strike out the figures "210" and insert the figures "211."

On page 23, line 6, strike out the figures "211" and insert the figures "212."

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not desire this afternoon to enter into any discussion of the proposed changes in the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). May the Chair interrupt the Senator just to inquire if he desires to have the proposed amendments printed and lie on the table?

Mr. SIMMONS. I was under the impression that probably it would be better if we had a reprint of the bill. ["No!" "No!"] Some of my colleagues disagree about that, and I will merely ask for a print of the amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not able to hear the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I say, I presume it will be sufficient to reprint that part of the bill which is amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does not the Senator think it would also be well to reprint that part of the bill which applies to the income taxes that we may have it printed in its amended form? Has that been done?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think that has been done, but I think there is very little complication about it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. A number of changes were made.

Mr. SIMMONS. The print covers the changes, except the so-called Gerry amendment and the Lenroot amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There could be a short print furnished us of the schedule of income taxes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection if the Senator desires it.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me suggest to the Senator that the only change that was made was the rejection of the committee amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. And the Gerry amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. With the exception of the so-called Gerry amendment. That is all printed right before us now.

Mr. SIMMONS. As I stated to the Senator from Georgia, really the only change was first the elimination of the Lenroot amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. So it is printed before us in the bill just as it is.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is printed. The Lenroot amendment was restored. Then the Gerry amendment dealt only with the last three brackets.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There were two or three brackets.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator desires to have that reprinted, I shall raise no objection to it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, do I understand that the Senator has not asked for a vote on this amendment? The proposition was to perfect the committee amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. That was all. I am merely proposing to perfect the committee amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. The question is, Has the proposed amendment been agreed to or not agreed to? Does the Senator want it agreed to?

Mr. SIMMONS. I assume that the committee has the right to perfect its amendment at any time.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think we ought to have a vote on it; we ought to have it a matter of record.

Mr. SIMMONS. A vote upon the amendment?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; but a vote upon the committee's proposal to perfect its amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think as a matter of right the committee can perfect its amendment at any time before it is adopted.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know that it is a matter of right. It is a matter of vote. They can propose it, and no one usually objects to it, I take it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We are not claiming to amend the House bill. We are merely perfecting our own suggestion of an amendment to it. The committee can perfect its suggestion of an amendment, just as an individual Senator who presents an amendment can perfect it before a vote is had upon his proposed amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. The committee can do so with the consent of the Senate, but when the bill is before the Senate I do not understand that the committee has that right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is very clearly of the opinion that a Senator offering an amendment has a right to perfect it; but the Chair is not so sure about the right of the committee to perfect an amendment which is offered by the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. The amendment is offered by me as chairman of the committee for the committee, and I think the uniform practice here has been to permit the chairman to control that matter and for the committee to perfect their amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there unanimous consent that the Finance Committee shall have the right to perfect their amendment as indicated? The Chair hears no objection, and therefore the permission is granted.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I simply desire to say to the Senate that there is very little new matter in these longer amendments. Most of the matter is simply as it appears in the present amendment, but the committee thought it was better to amend it in this way than to insert a few words here and there. So dealing with section 203 we have repeated the section as it appears in the bill with certain additions. The principal addition is that the deduction shall not be an amount less than 6 per cent or more than 10 per cent of the actual invested capital as of January 1 of the taxable year. It was necessary to repeat that language several times—first, as to domestic corporations and individual citizens; second, as to foreign corporations; and third, where the capital was increased or decreased. That is substantially the only change made in those sections.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. The committee, as I understand, has not changed the date; that is, it is figured as of January 1 of the taxable year?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the date fixed.

Mr. NORRIS. That was so before, was it not?

Mr. SIMMONS. We did not have this principle as to capitalization in the bill before.

Mr. NORRIS. You had a method of deduction?

Mr. SIMMONS. We had at one place, I think, and that language is the same.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, the 10 per cent and the 6 per cent are reckoned on the amount of capital actually invested?

Mr. SIMMONS. The percentage is reckoned on the actual capital invested——

Mr. NORRIS. That is the same as it was before?

Mr. SIMMONS. As ascertained on the 1st day of January.

Mr. NORRIS. That was not in before?

Mr. SIMMONS. No. Then, Mr. President, the next substantial change is in section 207, which is a new section, made necessary by the maximum and minimum rate based upon capital. That section is simply a reprint of the House bill definition of capital invested, with a slight emendation which related to borrowed money, which is not employed in their definition. In other words, Mr. President, the substantial changes which your committee propose in its original amendment relate practically to the establishment of a minimum and maximum exemption. In addition to that, we have added another bracket, so that we run the graduated rate imposed upon the excess war profits from 50 to 60 per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, can the Senator from North Carolina state the amount of revenue that would be raised under the new provisions?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. I will state, Mr. President, that as the result of these two changes, namely, the increase in the rate from 50 to 60 per cent and the establishment of a maximum and a minimum basis of exemption, the additional amount estimated to be realized from the bill will be within $2,000,000, I believe, of $500,000,000.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the changes which the committee have proposed are admirable, but I want to ask a question for information. In asking it I desire to state something which probably the country does not now know. Nebraska is to-day the greatest producer of potash of any State in the Union. The very great price to which potash advanced after the war with Germany broke out made it possible to convert the alkali lakes of western Nebraska into sources from which potash is now produced. To-day we are producing in Nebraska 50 tons of potash a day, a matter which is not generally known. In the four potash factories which have been established in the western part of the State near the Wyoming line the investments approximate, say, $200,000 for each one. Their profits are very large, and undoubtedly they will have to pay a very heavy war tax. I think that they will be subjected to the maximum; that is, because they had no profits at all before the war and were not in existence they will only be permitted to estimate a profit of 6 or 8 per cent, and everything above that will be subjected to this very heavy tax, which will approximate 60 per cent.

Now, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee, Will those factories be permitted to charge as a part of their expenses each year some portion of the capital which they have invested? Otherwise they might be in this predicament: Say they are making profits of 300 per cent or 400 per cent or 500 per cent larger than the normal and they pay 60 per cent of those profits to the Government and peace comes their investment is dead. Will they be permitted to charge as part of their expenses each year a portion of the capital which they have invested?

I speak of this particularly because I think the whole country is interested in it. Potash is one of the most sorely needed of the products of to-day, and nothing should be done which will discourage the production of that article. I believe these plants in Nebraska will be willing to pay 60 per cent of their profits as a war tax, because their profits are large, but what about their capital invested? Can the chairman of the committee make any statement which will throw any light on that question?

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt the Senator to make an inquiry before the chairman of the committee answers?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. I presumed the Senator from North Carolina had relinquished the floor, because he sat down. The Senator from Nebraska has made a very important announcement; the news he has furnished in regard to potash is very valuable, and the Senator is entirely correct about the supply of potash; but what I can not understand is his position that when peace comes the investment in the plants to which he has referred will be worthless, because we will need potash just as much after the war as we do now. There will be then, as there is now, an unlimited demand for potash. Of course I realize that after peace is restored Germany would compete with American producers.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will say in answer to the Senator that it is probable that the concerns which are now using the alkali water out of these lakes and by evaporation securing a residuum which is in effect potash when properly treated will probably not be able to compete with the German potash if we again begin importing it. If Germany is able to supply this country with potash the price will fall to such an extent that these plants will probably be useless.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to ask the Senator from Nebraska if it is not a fact that with the present prices of potash—the highest known in the history of the world—the plants established in Nebraska will, if allowed to run for a few months, pay more than all of the investment put in them?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Possibly they will.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest that, Mr. President, because there are companies in Utah manufacturing potash to-day, and the price they are receiving for potash is such that they make enormous profits. I understand, as the Senator from Nebraska has already stated, that after the war ceases—not immediately after the war ceases, because the potash supply is now used up to such an extent that there is practically none on hand anywhere in the world—the price will immediately begin to fall, and I have no doubt that the companies which have been formed in Nebraska to make potash out of the saleratus beds of that State will cease making it when normal conditions return; nor have I any doubt that the promoters of the business have figured that if they have but a few months to run they can make all that they put into it and perhaps a profit, and they are willing to take their chances of the war continuing a year or more.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, it is possible that that is so. Of course the profits are not known. My point was that nothing should be done in this bill so to increase the risk of establishing potash factories in other States, as well as in Nebraska, as to discourage the exploitation of that industry, because it is of vast value to the country. As it is now, we ought to be able to produce more of our own potash, and it is very important that while we are cut off from the German supply we should produce it by every means that we know of now and that can be devised. While I thoroughly approve of the amendment which the committee now proposes, and believe that the increase in the war-profits tax to a maximum of 60 per cent will meet the approval of the country, I think care should be taken not to discourage concerns from going into a business wherein they may, after paying a large war-profits tax, lose the capital that has been invested.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska has talked to me about this case. In some respects it is rather an exceptional case. The bill, I think, amply takes care of a case like that, provided there is some like or similar business which has made prewar profits.

Mr. SMOOT. Then it could not be above 10 per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then it could not be above 10 per cent. I see no way, Mr. President, that this particular industry can escape the higher rates provided in this bill, if they are making the enormous profits—300 or 400 per cent—the Senator from Nebraska says they are making; but it is very clear that an institution of that sort, if it can live for a few years, will not suffer very much, for even after it pays the contribution which the Government requires it would be left very large profits.

Mr. President, I want to say in addition and in further explanation of these amendments that we have not disturbed the provisions of the present bill with reference to the prewar profits. We ascertain the normal profits of individuals and corporations as originally proposed in the bill. Their normal profits are based on the average net income for the three years 1911, 1912, and 1913; but if those profits fall below 6 per cent, then we allow them an exemption of 6 per cent upon their invested capital; that is to say, if the deduction on account of the normal profit is less than 6 per cent, we permit them to have 6 per cent under this amendment.

There is also another provision in the bill which is of great importance to the man whose profits during the prewar period were subnormal. It is that provision of the bill which relates to the profits of representative concerns in like business.

If it shall be made to appear by a taxpayer that his profits were subnormal during these three years as compared with the profits of like business, he is then permitted to have the average earnings during these prewar years of representative concerns engaged in like business up to the full maximum, 10 per cent. That is to say, having shown that his profit was subnormal during this period, if the profits of average business exceed 6 per cent, he will be permitted to take the actual profits of like business at any point between 6 and 10 per cent. If the average was 7 per cent, he would have 7. If the average was 8, he would have 8. If the average was 9, he would have 9. If 10, he would have 10, but he could have no more. On the other hand, if the profits for the prewar period were 50 per cent or 25 per cent or any per cent in excess of 10 per cent upon the actual capital invested, then the taxpayer would not be entitled to a deduction in excess of 10 per cent upon his capital actually invested and employed in the business. We have sought to be fair, Mr. President, to the man whose profits were low during these years, to the man whose profits were subnormal during these three years, and we have sought not to permit the concern or the individual that happened to be making a very large profit before the war to escape taxation in excess of the 10 per cent exemption which we have allowed.

In order to make our original system workable with these changes it becomes necessary for us to define what "invested capital" means; and we have adopted the House definition as to that, with some slight changes, as I indicated before.

Those are, I believe, substantially the changes made in this amendment by the committee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, before the Senator sits down I should like to make an inquiry of him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand the Senator to say that the definitions of capital upon which this per cent is to be computed are the definitions which are carried in the House bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator understands me correctly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understood the Senator in his report and in his opening address upon the bill to criticize quite severely those provisions of the House bill as involving the Treasury Department in very serious embarrassments and complications in endeavoring to ascertain what was real capital.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is right about that. I did. I will state to the Senator that to avoid as far as practicable the dangers that I then brought to the attenion of the Senate, which grew out of a situation very common in this country, where a corporation has so-called watered stock as the result of probably a fictitious valuation of its good will, trade-mark, and so forth, the House provision attempts in very specific language to provide against that. I do not know whether the House provision has succeeded or not; but we have added—I am glad the Senator calls my attention to the matter—an additional provision to the definition of the House bill, which we hope will take care to a large extent, if not altogether, of that situation. It is this—it follows immediately after the definition:

(b) If the Secretary of the Treasury is unable satisfactorily to determine the average amount of the annual net income of the trade or business during the prewar period, or the actual invested capital as of January 1 of the taxable year, the war profits shall be determined as provided in subdivision (a) of section 204.

That is, by determining or ascertaining what were the average profits of representative concerns engaged in like business. We have attempted to leave this matter largely with the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If I might inquire, then, how is it expected that the Secretary of the Treasury could ascertain the capitalization and the amount of water in the representative concerns that are to be taken as the standard with which the business in question is to be measured?

Mr. SIMMONS. When we come to determine the profits of representative concerns for this purpose, we do not deal with capitalization at all, as the Senator will discover if he will turn to that section of the amendment. We simply take the net profits as determined by their return.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. You take the average profits of representative concerns?

Mr. SIMMONS. As determined by their return of net profits.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; but are you not involved in the same difficulty there, because their net profits are ascertained upon a capitalization that may be half water?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; but the Senator, I think, does not catch the whole proposition. We first take the net profits of these representative concerns during the prewar period. Then we take their net profits during the taxable year, and we find the ratio that the one bears to the other, and find what per cent that is, and then we allow the concern whose capital stock the Secretary has been unable to ascertain accurately the same percentage.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; I followed the Senator. I understood that.

Mr. SIMMONS. So that the matter of capitalization does not seem to me to be involved there.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. You allow the corporation about which the Secretary of the Treasury is in doubt the same percentage as was made by certain selected corporations, called representative corporations; and the average profits of these concerns will be based upon the book values of their respective businesses as a basis of ascertaining the average of their profits.

Mr. SIMMONS. Not at all. I do not understand that the net profits of a concern are based at all upon capitalization under section 204. They are not based upon capitalization at all. They return to the Secretary of the Treasury their net profits—that is, the net profits of their operations—without regard to their capitalization, just as the net income of a person is returned without reference to his capitalization. We accept their returns for the purposes of the income tax, and we accept their returns for the purposes of this tax. It is not a return based upon capital. It is a return based upon the net income growing out of the operations of that business, whether the capital be large or be small.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; but that net income is determined after they have paid dividends upon watered stock, and so would be affected by whether the capitalization is fictitious or not.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think that is after they have paid any dividends. Dividends are not allowed to be deducted from net incomes. Expenses of operation are deducted; taxes are deducted; insurance is deducted; any of those elements of expense are deducted, but they are not permitted to deduct dividends.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I misstated myself in that respect.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I was not present at the meeting of the committee this morning. I did not get my notice in time, for some reason or other. Do I understand from this amendment that all corporations are entitled to a 10 per cent exemption?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; not all corporations. That is the maximum. The corporation that is making more than 10 per cent is only entitled to 10 per cent deduction.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But a corporation that is making more than 10 per cent secures a 10 per cent exemption?

Mr. SIMMONS. If the concern is making more than 10 per cent, it is not allowed to have more than 10 per cent. If it is making 12 per cent, we will say, or making 20 per cent, we do not permit it a deduction of the 12 or the 20, but we only permit it a deduction of the 10. That is the maximum amount that it is entitled to have deducted.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. As an exemption?

Mr. SIMMONS. As an exemption; yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If a corporation is making 7 per cent, the exemption is 7 per cent, as I understand.

Mr. SIMMONS. If it is making 7 per cent—no.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Seven per cent before the war.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; before the war. If the man was making 7 per cent before the war, he would be entitled to 7 per cent; if he was making 8 per cent before the war, he would be entitled to 8 per cent, or 9, or 10, as the case might be; but if he was making only 6 per cent before the war, and he can show upon complaint that he was making substantially less than like business, then he would be permitted to have the average of like business, and whatever that average is, he is allowed as a deduction, until it reaches 10 per cent.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is, if the corporation was making less than 6 per cent it would fare better in that respect than a corporation that was making 7?

Mr. SIMMONS. Provided the corporation that was making less than 6 per cent was making substantially less than the average in the industry in which it is engaged. The Senator will see that that is intended to take care of the unfortunate man who was making an income upon his investment substantially lower than others who were engaged in the same line of business, as the result, we will say, of some misfortune, or some visitation of Providence, as in my case, when we had the floods down in my State. By reason of the enormous losses, the profits were practically nothing during those years. Now, he is entitled to 6 per cent if he actually made it, or he is entitled to 7 per cent if he actually made it, or 8 per cent if he actually made it, up to 10 per cent; but if he was unfortunate, and made less than the average in the business, then he is entitled to that average, up to the 10 per cent.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I wish to request that the expert for the committee compute, on certain corporations which I will name, the changes that the proposed amendment will make in the war-profits tax which they will be required to pay under this new amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall be very glad to have that done.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will submit to the expert a list of the corporations upon which I should like those computations made.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to say again that it is expected, as a result of these changes in the bill, that the amount of revenue estimated to be derived from the bill will be increased in round numbers $500,000,000. Of course a considerable part of that, though much the smaller part of it, is the result of the increase in the rates, raising the maximum graduated rate from 50 up to 60 per cent; but the larger part of that increase comes from the fact that corporations and individuals who during the prewar period were making a supernormal profit, a large profit, will be entitled to this reduced exemption on account of fixing the maximum at 10 per cent. Together the amendments swell the additional receipts of the Government from this bill from $562,000,000 to $1,060,000,000. That is the additional amount that will be raised by this bill—$1,060,000,000—from excess war profits, which, added to the amount estimated to be raised under the existing law which we have repealed and incorporated in this, makes $1,286,000,000 which will be raised by this bill from the taxes upon war profits.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the Senator state what proportion of that increased amount of additional taxation is derived from the new bracket of 60 per cent which is added to the war-profits provision of the bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. In round numbers, about $70,000,000.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment, which I should like to have read, printed in the RECORD, and pending in the morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Alabama proposes to strike out all of the last paragraph of section 200 from line 1 to line 8, inclusive, on page 12; also to strike out sections 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, and 206 and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 201. That in addition to the taxes under existing laws there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every corporation and partnership organized, authorized, or existing under the laws of the United States, or any State, Territory, or District thereof, no matter how created or organized, excepting income derived from the business of life, health, and accident insurance combined in one policy issued on the weekly premium payment plan, a tax on the amount by which such net income exceeds the sum (a) $5,000 and (b) 8 per cent of the actual capital invested, as follows:

Up to and including 5 per cent additional on such capital, 5 per cent.

From 5 per cent up to and including 10 per cent additional on such capital, 10 per cent.

From 10 per cent up to and including 15 per cent additional on such capital, 25 per cent.

From 15 per cent up to and including 20 per cent additional on such capital, 50 per cent.

Above 20 per cent additional on such capital, 75 per cent.

Every foreign corporation and partnership, including corporations and partnerships of the Philippine Islands and Porto Rico, shall pay for each taxable year a like tax upon the amount by which its net income received from all sources within the United States exceeds the sum of (a) 8 per cent of the actual capital invested and used or employed in the business in the United States, and (b) that proportion of $5,000 which the entire actual capital invested and used or employed in the business in the United States bears to the entire actual capital invested; and in case no such capital is used or employed in the business in the United States the tax shall be imposed upon that portion of such net income which is in excess of the sum of (a) 8 per cent of that proportion of the entire actual capital invested and used or employed in the business which the net income from sources within the United States bears to the entire net income and (b) that proportion of $5,000 which the net income from sources within the United States bears to the entire net income.

SEC. 202. That for the purpose of this title, actual capital invested means: First, actual cash, and second, the actual value, of all assets other than cash, used or employed in the business; but does not include money or other property borrowed by the corporation or partnership.

SEC. 203. That the tax herein imposed upon corporations and partnerships shall be computed upon the basis of the net income shown by their income-tax returns under Title I of the act entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September 8, 1916, or under this title, and shall be assessed and collected at the same time and in the same manner as the income tax due under Title I of such act of September 8, 1916: Provided, That for the purpose of this title a partnership shall have the same privilege with reference to fixing its fiscal year as is accorded corporations under section 13 (a) of Title I of such act of September 8, 1916: Provided further, That where a corporation or partnership makes return prior to March 1, 1918, covering its own fiscal year and includes therein any income received during the calendar year ending December 31, 1916, the tax herein imposed shall be that proportion of the tax based upon such full fiscal year which the time from January 1, 1917, to the end of such fiscal year bears to the full fiscal year.

SEC. 204. That corporations exempt from tax under the provisions of section 11 of Title I of the act approved September 8, 1916, and partnerships carrying on or doing the same business shall be exempt from the provisions of this title and the tax imposed by this title shall not attach to incomes of partnerships derived from agriculture or from personal services.

SEC. 205. That every corporation having a net income of $5,000 or more for the taxable year making a return under Title I of such act of September 8, 1916, shall for the purposes of this title include in such return a detailed statement of the actual capital invested.

Every partnership having a net income of $5,000 or more for the taxable year shall render a correct return of the income of the partnership for the taxable year, setting forth specifically the actual capital invested and the gross income for such year and the deductions hereinafter allowed. Such returns shall be rendered at the same time and in the same manner and form as is prescribed for income-tax returns under Title I of such act of September 8, 1916. In computing net income of a partnership for the purposes of this title there shall be allowed like deductions as are allowed to individuals in sections 5 (a) and 6 (a) of such act of September 8, 1916.

SEC. 206. That all administrative, special, and general provisions of law, including the laws in relation to the assessment, remission, collection, and refund of internal-revenue taxes not heretofore specifically repealed and not inconsistent with the provisions of this title are hereby extended and made applicable to all the provisions of this title and to the tax herein imposed, and all provisions of Title I of such act of September 8, 1916, relating to returns and payment of the tax therein imposed, including penalties, are hereby made applicable to the tax required by this title.

SEC. 207. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall make all necessary regulations for carrying out the provisions of this title, and may require any corporation or partnership subject to the provisions of this title to furnish him with such facts, data, and information as in his judgment are necessary to collect the tax provided for in this title.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand the situation to be that the committee has now perfected its amendment and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] offers what has just been read as an amendment to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute for it, and that is the pending question. I would like to inquire of the Senator from Alabama if he has figured out the revenues that would be produced by his amendment?

Mr. BANKHEAD. We have figured it out and we are having it revised by an expert with a view of presenting the figures to-morrow morning definitely and in detail. I will say, however, that we have no doubt whatever that the amendment I have offered will raise more money than the revised amendment of the Senate committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I send to the desk a paper signed by 59 Senators with this preface:

We, the undersigned Senators, move that, in accordance with the provisions of Rule XXII of the Senate, debate be brought to a close upon the pending bill, to wit, H. R. 4280.

I ask that the Secretary may read the names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

W. F. Kirby, F. M. Simmons, Morris Sheppard, Thomas S. Martin, George E. Chamberlain, Duncan U. Fletcher, Claude A. Swanson H. L. Myers, John F. Shafroth, John K. Shields, Kenneth McKellar, Ollie M. James, Willard Saulsbury, Peter G. Gerry, John B. Kendrick, F. G. Newlands, J. C. W. Beckham, Key Pittman, Lee S. Overman, William H. Thompson, O. W. Underwood, Paul O. Husting, John H. Bankhead, James D. Phelan, Ed. S. Johnson, John Walter Smith, Joseph E. Ransdell, Henry F. Hollis, Atlee Pomerene, John Sharp Williams, Joe T. Robinson, J. O. Wolcott, H. C. Lodge, Henry F. Ashurst, W. G. Harding, J. S. Frelinghuysen, Knute Nelson, William M. Calder, P. J. McCumber, Howard Sutherland, Frederick Hale, Miles Poindexter, Charles Curtis, LeBaron B. Colt, Thomas Sterling, P. Hitchcock, Robert L. Owen.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The notice will be entered under the rule.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to simply lodge the motion based upon that request of 59 Senators. I understand that we can not vote upon this proposition under the rule until Friday morning.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that I shall address the Senate on the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD] when the Senate meets to-morrow morning as soon as the bill is taken up.

RECESS.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know whether there is any desire for an executive session. There appears to be none, and I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m., Wednesday, August 29, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, August 30, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.
